This assessment was not authorized in law, and this judgment cannot be sustained for the reason that no valid assessment is shown to have been levied or made.

The receiver represents only the association. The rights of creditors to prosecute their claims against members of the association never were the property of the association, and the appointment of such receiver did not clothe him with power to assess and enforce the property right which belongs only to parties who are not before the court and who are not asking its assistance.

On petition for rehearing.

The court overlooked a very material difference between this contract and an old line life insurance contract on what is known as the level premium plan. The latter is based on the expectancy of human life and the practical theory that if a number of people pay in a certain sum during their natural lives regardless of the number of deaths, and it is carefully invested at 4 per cent per annum and compounded, it will raise a fund sufficient to pay each one's family a certain sum at his death, even though the company does no more business or secures no new members. While, on the contrary, the former is based upon the theory that it is better for the member and enables people of moderate means to better obtain insurance to leave this surplus fund in the hands of the members, which then becomes a trust fund in their hands to be called in by the association when needed, by assessments.

The court overlooked the fact that their decision in this case obliterates the rule laid down in Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Sears, 114 Ill. 108: "That the association stands as a trustee of a fund in the hands of its numerous members, but belonging to the beneficiaries, which can be called in by assessment for their use."

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee brought this suit as receiver of the Masonic Benevolent Association of Central Illinois to recover the amount of assessment made by him as such receiver, under an order of the court, against appellant, a member of the association, to cover death losses accrued while the association was doing business. The general issue is pleaded together with the stipulation that all defenses might be made under that plea. On trial a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff and damages assessed at $158.40. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and remittitur of $19.80 being entered, judgment was rendered for $138.60 and costs. The appellate court of the third district affirmed that judgment, and made a certificate of importance, under which the case is brought to this court.

The Masonic Benevolent Association, of which appellee is receiver was organized under an act concerning corporations, approved April 18, 1872; and the amendments to that act, approved March 28, 1874, May 22, 1883, and June 4, 1889, are to be considered in the discussion of the question here presented, together with an act approved June 22, 1893, under which the bill in this case was filed and the receiver appointed. It was held in Bastian v. Modern Woodmen of America, 166 Ill. 595, that the two acts approved June 22, 1893, were designed to create certain classes of corporations furnishing life insurance or indemnity under various former acts, and to enact and create a complete code for each. The Masonic Benevolent Association, of which appellee is receiver, belongs to a class governed by one of the acts of June 22, 1893, which was entitled "An Act to Incorporate Companies to Do the Business of Life or Accident Insurance on the Assessment Plan, and to Control Such Companies of This State and Other States Doing Business in This State, and to Repeal Certain Acts therein Named, and Providing and Fixing the Punishment for the Violation of the Provisions Thereof." This act was a revision of the subjects mentioned in its title, and provided by § 7 that such an association as the one for which appellee was receiver was declared to be engaged in the business of life insurance upon the assessment plan, and subject to the provisions of that act. The act further provided for reincorporation under it of corporations theretofore existing, but this was not made obligatory, and, if the corporation did not reincorporate, it could continue to exercise such existing powers and privileges as were not inconsistent with the act; but such corporations were to be governed by the provisions of the act. Sections 18 and 19 authorize the attorney general to file a bill when any incorporated organization under the laws of this state doing business in this state of the character prescribed in the act shall be insolvent, and so reported by the auditor, under which the court may dissolve the corporation, appoint a receiver, etc.

The question presented by this bill is as to the authority of the court to order an assessment of the members to pay liabilities and the right of the receiver to recover. The liability of appellant with the association of which appellee is receiver is to be decided by determining whether his contract of life insurance is a unilateral contract or not. The contracts for life insurance are almost universally held to be unilateral in their character, unless clearly expressed otherwise. The business transacted by the Masonic Benevolent Association of Central Illinois was a life insurance business, so far as it pertains to the issuing of beneficiary certificates payable upon the death of the holders or collection of mortuary assessments and the payment of death benefits. In May on Insurance (§ 550) it is stated: "There are certain organizations prevalent in this country and elsewhere under the name of relief, benefit, or benevolent societies, or some similar name, which generally have for their object aid to their members or to their widows and children after the decease of their respective members. . . . These associations, though not speculative, and not based upon capital paid in as an investment, have nevertheless a general purpose of mutual protection. . . . Their certificates of membership often resemble, both in form and substance, ordinary policies of life insurance; and the courts have with great uniformity treated them as substantially life insurance companies, applying to them and to the virtual relatives of the members the rules and principles applicable to the contract of life insurance." In Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 161, it is said: "This is not the less a contract of mutual insurance upon the life of the assured because the amount to be paid by the corporation is not a gross sum, but a sum graduated by the number of members holding similar contracts; nor because a portion of the premiums is to be paid upon the uncertain periods of the deaths of such members; nor because, in case of nonpayment of assessments by any member, the contract provides no means of enforcing payment thereof." In Railway Pass. & Freight Conductors' Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. v. Robinson, 147 Ill. 138, it is held that a mutual benefit association is a life insurance company for all purposes except that it is relieved from certain conditions and rules provided by the statute in the act of March 26, 1860. In that opinion it is held: "The object and purpose for which the defendant was incorporated . . . was to furnish pecuniary aid to the widows, heirs, devisees, and representatives of deceased members of the association, . . . and on proof of such death the association should assess and collect from each surviving member the sum of $2.50 for the benefit of the heirs or devisees of the deceased member, the same to be paid to him or them, to the amount of not exceeding $2,500, within thirty days after collection of the assessment. There can be no doubt, we think, that the benefits provided for by the constitution and by-laws of the association are in the nature of life insurance, and that the contract between the association and the member, evidenced by the Constitution, by-laws, and membership certificate, is, in substance, a policy of insurance upon the life of the member." In Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Benev. Soc. 129 Ill. 440, it was said (p. 457): "That the undertaking evidenced by the certificate is one of insurance . . . cannot be seriously questioned. It is an undertaking by a society, in view of the ascertained age and condition of health of one of its members, in consideration of a present payment of a sum of money and of the undertaking to pay other contingent sums in the future by him, to pay a sum to him, or to his widow or heirs, etc., contingent as to time, upon the duration of his life; and it has been held that the undertaking is not the less a contract of insurance because the amount to be paid by the corporation is not a gross sum, but a sum graduated by the number of members holding similar contracts; nor because a portion of the premium is to be paid upon the uncertain periods of the deaths of such members: nor because, in case of nonpayment of assessments by members, the contract provides no means of enforcing payment thereof." It is stated in Bacon on Benefit Societies and Life Insurance (§ 357): "In a contract of life insurance there is generally no absolute undertaking of the insured to pay the premiums or assessments, and consequently no personal liability therefor." In People, Strigert, v. Golden Rule, 114 Ill. 25, it was said (p. 45): "Although the payment of dues to a corporation on account of . . . assessments upon its members may be purely voluntary, persons may acquire legal rights to share in them when they are paid. Through forfeiture of benefits . . . payments of . . . assessments may be almost, if not quite, as effectually enforced as by legal process." In Chicago Mut. L. Indemnity Asso. v. Hunt, 127 Ill. 257, 2 L. R. A. 549, it was 43 L. R. A.

said (p. 277): "The contention is that the certificate of membership is a personal contract between the member and the association, and that, as an infant is capable of making only a voidable contract, his admission to membership is a violation of those principles of mutuality which lie at the basis of mutual benefit societies. We may admit in the broadest sense that these societies are founded upon the principle of entire mutuality in relation to burdens as well as benefits, yet we are unable to see how that principle places the membership of infants upon any footing different from that of adults. While the certificate of membership is a contract, such contract, in the absence of express stipulations to the contrary, is purely unilateral. It may be enforced against the association where the member has performed all the prescribed conditions, but none of its stipulations are enforceable against the member. If he fails to pay his assessments, . . . the certificate becomes void, and the membership ceases. . . . The making of an assessment . . . does not make the member a debtor to the association, so as to authorize it to bring a suit for its recovery in case of his neglect or refusal to pay. Payment is left wholly to his discretion."

Under these authorities, a contract for insurance in any benevolent association is a unilateral contract, and by the association provision is made that, for a failure to pay the assessments made on a member who holds a certificate, all benefits he may have under and by virtue of such certificate, and all payments theretofore made, are forfeited. Such is the rule with reference to insurance under almost all circumstances. If any other rule should exist than that a contract is purely unilateral, then, in effect, a partnership would be formed by which every person insured would become liable to all others insured, and the benefits derived from life insurance would be rendered so doubtful and uncertain, and so prejudicial to those seeking insurance, that their individual interests would require them to abstain from taking out a policy or a certificate of membership. If by taking out a certificate of membership or a policy they create a continuous liability against themselves which might be enforced by the company or association, or by the court through its receiver, then few men would avail themselves of the benefits of a policy or certificate of membership which would create a liability they could not throw off at pleasure, but that would make them indefinitely liable for assessments or premiums. The whole scheme of insurance is based on a contract purely unilateral, and whether the payment for insurance be termed a premium or an assessment, the right of the association or company is to declare a forfeiture for nonpayment of premium or assessment, and not a right to recover the assessment or premium in a suit. Section 1 of article 5 of the by-laws of the association of which appellee is receiver provides: "The board of directors shall furnish each member of the association with a certificate of membership, . . . which shall contain the agreement on the part of the association and the member." The certificate of membership provides "that the Masonic Benevolent Association of Central Illinois, in consideration of the representations and warrants made to it in the application for this membership, which is hereby made part," declares the application is a part of the certificate of membership and the basis of the contract. The application for membership declares: "I acknowledge and agree that the above statement shall form the basis of the agreement with the association, and constitute a warranty; and I further agree, if accepted as a member of the association, to faithfully abide by all its rules and regulations. Nor shall the association be liable for any benefit thereon until a certificate duly signed and sealed shall issue from the principal office of the association; or if any omission or neglect to pay any of the dues or assessments on or before the days on which they shall be due and payable shall take place, or if any fraudulent and untrue answers and misrepresentations have been made, in either event said certificate shall become null and void, and all money which shall have been paid forfeited." This application and the certificate, each referring to the other, must be taken together as constituting the contract, and by the by-laws above quoted, the agreement is contained in the certificate of membership and the application. By this application and certificate of membership there is no promise to pay, but a purely unilateral contract is made. Section 1 of article 3 of the by-laws provides that upon the death of a member the secretary shall send notice by mail of the assessment due from each member, which shall be deemed and taken to be lawful and sufficient notice for the payment of the assessment called for, and any member failing to pay such assessment within fifteen days after such notice shall forfeit his membership, and all benefits therefrom. The constitution of the association (§ 1, art. 7) provides that upon the death of a member of the association each member shall be assessed and shall pay according to the class in which he is a member. This provision of the constitution and these several by-laws, together with the application and certificate of membership, must be held to create the contract of insurance between the association and the member. It is a contract of life insurance. By article 8 of the constitution it is provided a surplus fund shall be raised from admission fees, from that portion of the assessments not used for the payment of benefits, etc., and that the surplus fund shall be limited to $40,000, and be held for the following purposes: That benefits may be paid to the heirs of deceased members before assessments are collected from survivors; to insure stability and perpetuity, and make up deficiencies caused by those who fail to pay assessments, and to provide for contingencies that may arise; to pay for medical examinations, printing, and other expenses of management. Admission fees were in no way connected with mortuary assessments, 43 L. R. A.

except as was provided by that article of the constitution under which benefits were to be paid to the heirs of the deceased members before assessments were collected from the survivors when it became necessary. When a person became a member of this association by an application and certificate of membership, which were to be considered together with the by-laws and constitution, he became entitled to all the benefits of membership, and by the payment he had then made he paid for his insurance up to the time of the maturity of the next assessment upon the death of a member. The application, certificate of membership, and by-laws all provided that upon failure to pay any assessment for a death benefit within the time specified the certificate of membership shall become void, and the member forfeit all benefits in the association, and all moneys paid. The provisions of the contract make the forfeiture a part of the contract, and a failure to pay within the time limited causes the forfeiture, and the contract is self-executing in creating the forfeiture. Northwestern Traveling Men's Assn. v. Schauss, 148 Ill. 304. As said in Chicago Mut. L. Indemnity Assn. v. Hunt, 127 Ill. 257, 2 L. R. A. 549, "the making of the assessment does not make the member a debtor to the association, so as to authorize it to bring a suit for its recovery in case of his neglect or refusal to pay." From the principles underlying the whole business of life insurance, whether by what may be termed the old companies, or by mutual benefit associations, the unilateral character of the contract is well expressed in the case last cited. The making of an assessment does not make the member a debtor to the association, so as to authorize it to bring a suit for recovery in case of his neglect or refusal to pay, and it would be an anomaly if the law would authorize a proceeding to be had by an officer appointed by a court of equity to have a recovery in favor of, and for the benefit of, a corporation, where the corporation itself could not sue and recover. No principle would authorize such a recovery.

It is insisted that a member who has had the benefit of insurance ought to be required to pay the death benefit of other members, who die while he thus had the benefit of insurance. The payment of an admission fee is insurance in advance up to the maturity of the first assessment provided for by the constitution and by-laws and by the certificate of membership and the application. If the member paid no more, he simply forfeited all that he had paid, and all benefits under his certificate, but had paid for all he had received. By paying the first assessment, and continuing to pay assessments thereafter made from time to time, each time he so paid an assessment his assessment was for his insurance until the maturity of the next assessment. Only when he failed to pay an assessment made did he cease to be a member, and forfeit all benefits thereunder; and no equitable principle exists which gives a right of recovery against a member who thus elects to no longer pay assessments and who has paid for all he has received in way of insurance. By ceasing to pay, he ceased to be a member, and a forfeiture existed, and he acted in accordance with that contract, having paid for all he received. The provisions of the constitution, by-laws, application, and certificate of membership provided for the payment of assessments, and also created the full penalty for the failure to pay such assessments, which is a forfeiture of insurance, of membership, interest in the surplus fund, and all benefits by reason of belonging to the association, together with all moneys paid.

Appellee urges the principles established in the case of New Era Life Assn. v. Rossiter, 132 Pa. 314. In that case the application contained the agreement that "the members and beneficiary shall be jointly and severally liable for all death claims," etc. The promise in that case is express and absolute, and constitutes a joint and several promise and undertaking, and cannot be held to constitute in the application a provision for a unilateral contract. Great reliance is had on the authority of Ellerbe v. Barney, 119 Mo. 632, 23 L. R. A. 435. In that case three of the seven judges dissented. The opinion of the court is based on the position that the contract is not really an insurance contract, and that the assessments ought to be treated, not as premiums, but as lodge dues. In the latter case the supreme court of Missouri said: "The unilateral feature contended for in this contract has been very generally imposed upon the contract of the regular, old-line, premium-collecting life insurance companies. These companies were unable to commence business except upon capital paid in by the members or stockholders, to be used in meeting death losses as they occurred. Until called for, the capital, along with all premiums not wanted for expenses, was required to be invested for profit and accumulation. The premiums were payable annually, and invariably in advance. Upon payment of the first premium, as a condition precedent, the assured received a policy covering him for one year, with the option to continue it by payment of other premiums. This payment constituted the full consideration of value to be paid during the year of insurance. Nothing in the shape of dues or assessments could be exacted from him for the period covered by the premium paid. If any of the old-line companies should suddenly stop insuring, and decline to issue another policy, every policy outstanding would be paid from the accumulated capital as it matured. An inability to do so would put it out of line in the business of insurance, and indicate that it had not been conducted and managed according to the principles upon which it was founded." But in speaking of the certificate in the Masonic Benefit Society of Missouri it was said: "Hence the certificate of membership in such an organization is a contract with every member of it, to be enforced by the managing officers as representatives or trustees for all the members of the concern. When the member joins, he pays the admission fee, which is used to defray necessary expenses, but which is altogether too small to constitute a fund or capital wherewith to satisfy death losses. No fund or capital is kept on hand or invested for such a purpose. Indeed, the economy underlying the plan of the organization aims at doing away with the expense and loss incident to the management, investment, and accumulation of capital. As a substitute therefor, each member promises to contribute an equal share with every other member upon occasion of every death in the membership, which is collected and paid over by the officers of the association to the wife or children of the deceased member, as the case may be. The ascertainment and declaration of death losses is left to the members of the association, and their action in that behalf is known as an assessment. They are bound to make these assessments on occasion of every death, and the wife or children of the deceased member or other beneficiary have the right to compel them to make and collect the assessments inuring to their benefit. It is manifest that these assessments, in their nature, bear a near resemblance to the dues incident to membership in a friendly society, and constitute a consideration for the promised insurance of the association, materially differing from the annual premium stock companies. When considered in the light of society dues, it will be admitted that a person cannot, by discontinuing his membership, escape the obligation of paying those dues which accrued before the termination of his membership." The contract in this case is in no sense for the assessment and collection of lodge dues. By the provisions of the constitution and by-laws of this association assessments made are not lodge dues, but are assessments for the payment of death benefits. The payment of the premium is optional with the insured, and, if he makes default, the insurer has no other remedy than a forfeiture of the policy. 2 May, Ins. 3d ed. § 341a. And the same principle applies to certificates issued by mutual benefit life insurance societies as is applicable to ordinary life insurance companies. Re Protection L. Ins. Co. 9 Biss. 188; Niblack, Ben. Soc. 276; Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 357. The constitution and by-laws define the duty of the association and its officers, and provide the mode of obtaining and maintaining membership. An applicant possessing certain qualifications provided in the constitution and by-laws, upon performance of certain things required therein, may become a member, and by doing and refraining from doing certain things required by the constitution and by-laws he may maintain his membership. If he fails to do any of the things required or does any of the things forbidden, he forfeits his membership, and all benefits and all interest in all money he has paid. He agreed, in effect, that so long as he remained a member he would obey all the rules and regulations established for the government of the conduct of members, and the association on its part agreed that the sole and only penalty or liability for failure to obey should be the forfeitures above mentioned. There is no express, absolute promise to pay, or to continue to pay, assessments. There is nothing that can be tortured into a direct, express undertaking to remain a member, and continue to pay, as long as one lives. The language deliberately selected by the association in which to express its contract, as appears in the certificate, application, and by-laws, makes the forfeiture self-executing; and the member without any action on the part of the association, by mere force of his failure to pay eo instanti, ceases to be a member. This is not like those cases where the association must do something or refrain from doing something to make the forfeiture complete. Northwestern Traveling Men's Assn. v. Schauss, 148 Ill. 304. The language of § 1 of art. 3 of the by-laws here is: "Any member failing to pay such assessment within fifteen days after such notice has been served upon him shall forfeit his membership in the association and all benefits therefrom." Under the holdings in the cases above cited the forfeiture is absolutely self-executing.

The reasons why the option is not with the association are apparent. We have no statute in this state concerning withdrawing members, or providing for any mode of withdrawing, etc., and no one ever contemplated that every person who joins such an association or society is bound to stay in for life. There is no other provision in the constitution or by-laws of the association, or in the application, or in the certificate, or anywhere else, providing for the withdrawal of members. Such contracts have heretofore always been considered unilateral, and so the whole plan for withdrawing is embraced in these self-executing clauses of the by-laws and contract. The member's failure to pay is his declaration of severance, and the forfeiture provided for in the by-laws and contract is the association's compensation. The option is with the member, and not with the association. When appellant became a member, he was required, among other things, to pay a sum into the mortuary surplus fund. This sum was two maximum assessments on his $4,000 certificate. This money went directly into the fund for paying death losses, not a cent of it for dues or expenses. This more than paid his insurance from the date of his admission to the date of the maturity of his assessment for the first death benefit after he became a member. When he had paid the first assessment, that paid for his insurance to the maturity of the second, and so on. The requirements for admission, not only in this association, but in all benefit associations or societies, more than cover the member's insurance from the date of his admission to the maturity of the first assessment after he becomes a member.

The statute under which the receiver was appointed contemplates that, if the court shall find that the association cannot longer continue in operation, and properly serve its purpose, then the court shall appoint a receiver, and wind up its affairs; or, if the court shall find that it might longer continue in business, and properly serve its purpose, 43 L. R. A.

if its officers would do their duty in making assessments, then the court need not appoint a receiver, and wind up the concern, but may order an additional assessment to be made to meet deficiencies, and allow the concern to continue in operation. This shows that the legislature treated these contracts as unilateral. It did not contemplate the making of an assessment after the association had been found unable to longer properly serve its purpose. It is true that, a receiver having been appointed by the court, the court has power independently of any statute to order him to collect assets, but that power does not change the character of the contract between the association and the member, and make the member a debtor who, by his contract, is not so. When such association or society for any reason becomes unable longer to properly carry out its purpose, some must lose. All must lose except those that died and were paid before the association became disabled. Those that have died, and not been paid, should have all there is left, and lose the balance; those who continue to live get nothing, and lose all. But it is said those that continue to live had their insurance all the time. They had just that kind of insurance that those that died had, and no better, and paid just as much for it. Those that have died get the surplus fund, and whatever else there is, and those that have lived get nothing. The mistakes or mismanagement which caused the ruin, if the fault of the members at all, was as much the fault of the dead as of the living, and was equally the misfortune of all.

A majority of the court holds that under the provisions of this certificate of membership, taken together with the application and the constitution and by-laws of this association, the contract was purely unilateral, and no recovery could be had thereunder by the association against the member, and for the same reason a recovery could not be had by a receiver appointed by the court to take charge of the assets of the association.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount of a draft which plaintiff held under a forged indorsement. Affirmed.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

This suit was originally begun before a justice of the peace, and taken by appeal to the circuit court of Cook county. In the circuit court the cause was submitted by agreement to be tried by the court without a jury. The finding of the court was against the appellant here, who was the plaintiff below, and in favor of the appellee here, who was the defendant below. Judgment was rendered upon the finding, which was for an amount less than $1,000. An appeal was taken to the appellate court. The appellate court has affirmed the judgment of the circuit court, and granted a certificate of importance. There is no controversy as to the facts. The case was tried upon a stipulation as to the facts, which were substantially as follows: On September 15, 1891, one George P. Bent, of No. 223 Canal street, Chicago, sent for collection to the First National Bank of Council Bluffs, Iowa, a note for $133.50, made by a man by the name of Max Bournicus. On September 28, 1891, the First National Bank of Council Bluffs collected the note, and on the same day made its draft for $133.25 on the National Bank of Chicago, Illinois, to the order of George A. Bent, Chicago. The draft was made payable to the order of George A. Bent, instead of George P. Bent, by mistake. It was mailed to George A. Bent, Chicago, Illinois. George P. Bent was intended to be made the payee in the draft. George A. Bent never had any business transactions with appellee, the drawee, or with the First National Bank of Council Bluffs, the drawer of the draft. The latter bank was never indebted to George A. Bent. A man named George A. Bent received the draft from the postoffice, and indorsed upon it his own name, George A. Bent, and sold it to the appellant. The facts tend to show that the appellant purchased the draft in good faith, relying upon one Beach, a broker whom he knew, although he was not acquainted with George A. Bent, the supposed payee in the draft. After purchasing the draft the appellant deposited it for his own account in the Bank of Commerce in Chicago, which cleared through the Union National Bank of Chicago. The draft was paid by the appellee bank through the Union National Bank. The appellee returned the draft to the National Bank of Council Bluffs, and it was there discovered that George A. Bent had received the draft intended for George P. Bent. Affidavits setting up the facts and the mistake which had occurred were made and attached to the draft, and the draft, with the affidavits so attached, was returned to the appellee. The appellee returned the draft to the Union National Bank, which redeemed it, under the rules of the clearing house. The Union National Bank presented it to the Bank of Commerce, and the latter bank took it up, and required the appellant to make the same good. The appellant took the draft to the appellee bank, and, ascertaining that the appellee had funds in its hands belonging to the First National Bank of Council Bluffs, the drawer of the draft, demanded payment, but payment was refused by appellee on the alleged ground that the indorsement of the payee was a forgery. Six propositions were submitted by the appellant (the plaintiff below) to the trial court to be held as law in the decision of the case. Two of these were marked "Held," two were marked "Refused," and two were modified, and marked "Held" after being thus modified. The trial court, of its own motion, made in writing, and held affirmatively, a proposition holding that no right of action existed against the appellee, the National Bank of Illinois, and declined to hold whether or not the First National Bank of Council Bluffs was liable. Proper exceptions were taken to the action of the court.

Mr. Harry Vincent, for appellant:

Where the wrongful act of one party must fall upon one of two, both equally innocent, the loss must be borne, if by either, by the one whose negligence made the wrong possible,—is applicable to banks and bank paper.

Bank of United States v. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat. 339, 6 L. ed. 336.

The business of this bank is quasi public. Meudowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 35 L. R. A. 176.

The very highest degree of care is due from a bank at all times.

Gray v. Merriam, 148 Ill. 179, 32 L. R. A. 769.

Such circumstances create an estoppel in favor of the deceived party against the negligent party.

United States v. National Exch. Bank, 45 Fed. Rep. 163; Hurdy v. Chesapeake Bank, 51 Md. 585.

The drawing and delivery of a check upon a fund deposited in a bank is in effect an assignment of such fund in toto or pro rata, and, after demand made, the holder of the check has a direct cause of action against the bank if it has at the time sufficient funds of the drawer in its hands and refuses to make payment.

National Bank of America v. National Bank, 164 Ill. 504; Abt v. American Trust & Sav. Bank, 159 Ill. 467.

What difference does it make in the relations of this drawee (appellee) and holder (appellant) whether appellant's title to the money represented by this draft is created by an act of the drawer, which amounts to a transfer by conveyance, or by an act of the drawer, which amounts to a transfer by estoppel? In either case it is the money of the Council Bluffs Bank which is transferred, and the act of the Council Bluffs Bank which makes the transfer. Under the law of Illinois appellee has absolutely no interest in this deposit except to keep it safely and to pay it out to the person to whom the drawer may transfer it by draft.

The suggestion that payment by appellee to appellant might be followed by a necessity of paying over again to George P. Bent is of no force here. The same law which binds the agent by the act of his principal gives the agent an action against the principal when damaged through his negligence. If appellant pays this money twice then it simply calls upon its negligent correspondent at Council Bluffs to pay it twice, and by giving notice to the Council Bluffs Bank and an opportunity to assist in defending this suit, appellant binds the Council Bluffs Bank by the judgment.

Blasdale v. Babcock, 1 Johns. 517; Herman, Estoppel, § 64; Bigelow, Estoppel, p. 131.

Mr. Arnold Heap for appellee.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this record is within a very narrow compass. It is whether a party holding a draft under a forged indorsement of the payee therein, or what amounts to a forged indorsement, can compel the drawee to pay him the draft. It is established clearly by the evidence that the George A. Bent who took the draft from the postoffice, and indorsed his name upon the back of it, was not the real payee, to whom the drawer of the draft intended to make it payable. It is true that the real and intended payee and real owner of the draft was named George P. Bent; but the fact that the name of the real owner and the name of the fraudulent possessor of the draft differ, so far as the middle letter of the name is concerned, does not make the case other than a case where the name of the real payee and the name of the assumed payee are the same. This is so because the law does not regard the middle initial letter as a part of a person's name, but only recognizes one Christian name of a party. Thompson v. Lee, 21 Ill. 242; Erskine v. Davis, 25 Ill. 251; Miller v. People, 39 Ill. 457; Bletch v. Johnson, 40 Ill. 116; Humphrey v. Phillips, 57 Ill. 132. Where a bill is payable to the order of a person, and another person of the name of the payee gets hold of it, and indorses it to a party who takes it in good faith and for value, such party acquires no title to the bill. Cochran v. Atchison, 27 Kan. 728. If the indorsement so made by a person who is not the real payee, but has the same name as the real payee, is made by such person with full knowledge that he is not the real payee, and with intent to perpetrate a fraud, his indorsement cannot be regarded otherwise than as a forgery. In Barfield v. State, 29 Ga. 127, 74 Am. Dec. 49, it was held that where there were two persons of the same name, and one of them signed that name to certain notes with the intention that the notes might be used in trade as the notes of the other, it was a forgery. Blackstone (4 Com. 247) defines forgery to be the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man's right. "One may be guilty of forgery if he fraudulently signs his name, although it is identical with that of the person who should have signed. Thus, if a bill of exchange is payable to A B or order, and it comes to the hand of a person named A B, who is not the payee, and who fraudulently indorses it for the purpose of obtaining the money, this is a forgery." United States v. Long, 30 Fed. Rep. 678. Where an indorsement is made for the purpose of being fraudulently used as the indorsement of another person, it is falsely made. The falsity of the act consists in the intent that the indorsement shall pass and be received as that of some other party, and in such case the charge of forgery can be maintained, although the signature is of a name which might lawfully be used by the person who put it on the draft or bill of exchange. Com. v. Foster, 114 Mass. 311, 19 Am. Rep. 353. In People v. Peacock, 6 Cow. 73, where certain coal was consigned to George Peacock, of New York, and arrived there, and was claimed by another of the same name, who resided in the same city, but was not the true consignee, and he, knowing this, obtained an advance of money on indorsing the permit for the delivery of the coal with his own proper name, it was held that this was forgery. Nothing is better settled than that a forged indorsement does not pass title to commercial paper negotiable only by indorsement, and does not justify the payment of such paper. Here, whether the indorsement of the payee's name was technically a forgery, or was merely a spurious and false indorsement, in either case it was inoperative to change the title to the instrument. Graves v. American Exch. Bank, 17 N. Y. 205. In Graves v. American Exch. Bank, 17 N. Y. 205, it was held that the drawee of a bill of exchange is bound to ascertain that the person to whom he makes payment is the genuine payee, or is authorized by him to receive it, that it is no defense against such a payee that the drawee, in the regular course of business, with nothing to excite suspicion, paid the bill to a holder in good faith and for value, under an indorsement of a person bearing the same name as the payee. There it was said by the court: "The defendants, on whom the draft was drawn paid it upon the indorsement of another Charles F. Graves, residing at or near La Salle, who wrongfully took it from the postoffice at Mendota. Such a payment, although made in good faith, did not divest or impair the title of the owner who had not seen or indorsed the paper." In Mead v. Young, 4 T. R. 28, the action was brought by the indorser of a bill of exchange against the acceptor, the bill having been drawn by one Christian on the defendant in London, payable to Henry Davis or order; and having been put into the foreign mail, inclosed in a letter from Christian, it got into the hands of another Henry Davis than the one in whose favor it was drawn. The defendant accepted the bill, and it was discounted by the plaintiff. It was held that it was competent for the defendant to prove that the person who indorsed to the plaintiff was not the real payee, though he was of the same name, and though there was no addition to the name of the payee on the bill; and it was also held that if a bill of exchange payable to A or order got into the hands of another person of the same name with the payee, and such person, knowing that he was not the real person in whose favor it was drawn, indorsed it, he was guilty of a forgery. In that case Ashhurst, J., said: "In order to derive a legal title to a bill of exchange, it is necessary to prove the handwriting of the payee: and therefore, though the bill may come by mistake into the hands of another person, though of the same name with the payee, yet his indorsement will not confer a title." In the same case Buller, J., said: "I am of opinion that it is incumbent on a plaintiff who sues on a bill of exchange, to prove the indorsement of the person to whom it is really payable. . . . Now, here it is clear that the indorsement was not made by the same H. Davis to whom the bill was made payable, and no indorsement by any other person will give any title whatever."

In the case at bar, when the appellant presented the draft for payment to the appellee the latter had a right to know that the appellant held the draft under a genuine indorsement. When the appellant presented the draft for payment, it had been ascertained that the indorsement was forged, or at all events spurious and false, and was therefore void. No title passed by it, and, if the appellee had made payment to the appellant, appellee could have been compelled again to pay the draft to the true owner thereof. Daniel, in his work on Negotiable Instruments, says: "The maker of a note or the acceptor of a bill must satisfy himself, when it is presented for payment, that the holder traces his title through genuine indorsements; for, if there is a forged indorsement, it is a nullity, and no right passes by it. And payment to a holder under a forged indorsement would be invalid as against the true owner, who might require it to be paid again. . . . The payor should also satisfy himself of the identity of the holder; for he cannot defend himself against the real payee by showing that he paid the amount of the bill or note to another person of the same name, in good faith and in the usual course of business." 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 1225. So, also, Randolph, in his work on Commercial Paper, says: "Where a bank holds a note or bill for collection under a forged indorsement, and collects and pays it over to its principal, it will still be liable to the real owner for the amount collected. . . . So, if a bill is indorsed by another person in the payee's name, and paid to the holder under such indorsement, the payee may recover such payment." 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1469.

It follows from the authorities thus referred to that the appellant, having no title to the draft, was not entitled to recover the amount thereof from the appellee. If, without knowledge of the real character of the indorsement of the draft by the supposed payee named therein, the appellee had paid the amount of the draft to the appellant, it could have recovered such amount back from the appellant. This results from the fact that "the indorser contracts that the bill or note is in every respect genuine, and neither forged, fictitious, nor altered." 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 672. Tiedeman, in his work on Commercial Paper, says: "Inasmuch as the indorser also warrants that he has a perfect title to the paper by indorsement, and is liable if his title proves defective, and since no title passes on a forged indorsement,—it follows as a necessary consequence that the indorser must warrant the genuineness of the prior indorsements." § 259. Randolph, in his work on Commercial Paper, says: "Since an indorsement warrants the genuineness of prior indorsements, payment made by the drawee to an indorser, holding under a forged indorsement, may be recovered from such holder." § 1469. It was held in Chambers v. Union Nat. Bank, 78 Pa. 205, that the holder of a draft which is indorsed and passed by him guarantees the prior indorsement. In Cochran v. Atchison, 27 Kan. 728, where a bill was payable to W. W. Owens and one W. W. Owen obtained possession of it and wrongfully indorsed it, it was held that a subsequent indorser could not relieve himself from liability to his immediate indorsee on the ground that the latter was guilty of negligence in taking the paper without the name of the actual payee indorsed thereon, upon the grounds that the indorser guarantees the genuineness of the signature of the payee, and that the difference in pronunciation between "Owens" and "Owen" was so slight as not to amount to a variance. The court held generally in that case that an indorser warrants the genuineness of indorsements on a bill of exchange. If, therefore, it be true that, upon payment of the amount of the draft to appellant by appellee, a recovery could be had by appellee from the appellant of the amount so paid, upon the ground that appellant by his indorsement had guaranteed the genuineness of the previous indorsement by George A. Bent, it would be useless to hold that a right of recovery exists in favor of the appellant against the appellee. To require the appellee to pay an amount which it could hereafter recover back again would be an idle ceremony.

Counsel for appellant claims that he has a right of action for negligence against the First National Bank of Council Bluffs, Iowa, because of the alleged carelessness of that bank, which was the drawer of the draft, in not mailing it properly to the payee named therein. In other words, it is said that, instead of addressing the letter inclosing the draft to George A. Bent, of Chicago, it should have addressed it to George P. Bent, of 223 South Canal street, Chicago. We do not deem it necessary to decide whether or not an action will lie in favor of the appellant against the Iowa bank. This action is against the appellee bank, and it is sufficient to say that, so far as this record shows, the appellee was guilty of no negligence.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois, ex rel.
Maurice T. MOLONEY, Attorney General, and Eight Other Cases.

(174 Ill. 203.)

1. That a statute providing for licensing public warehousemen provides an efficient remedy for violation of their duty cannot be raised for the first time on appeal in an equity case to enjoin them from using their privileges to suppress competition.
2. Equity has jurisdiction of a suit to enjoin a licensed warehouseman from using his license so as to suppress competition in trade in the articles stored in his warehouse, and enable him to monopolize the business.
3. One licensed to keep a public warehouse for storage of grain will not be permitted to deal in grain and store the same in his own licensed warehouse; and the same rule applies to stockholders of a corporation so licensed.
4. Failure of warehouse commissioners to appeal to the attorney general to institute suits, or to question the legality of the conduct of warehousemen in storing their own grain in their warehouses, does not amount to a practical construction of the statute providing for licensing warehouses so as to show that it authorizes such conduct.

A PPEALS by defendants from decrees of the Circuit Court for Cook County enjoining defendants and other stockholders from storing their own grain in their warehouses to the detriment of other grain merchants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion. *

Messrs. Custer, Goddard, & Griffin, and James E. Munroe, with Mr. John J. Herriek, for appellants:

The storing of his own grain in his warehouse, by the proprietor of a warehouse of class A, is not unlawful.

The provision requiring the elevator proprietor to procure a license is in no respect different from a like provision in any law or ordinance requiring those engaged in any particular business or avocation to take out a license as a condition of doing business.

The plain distinction between a license and a charter creating a corporation is forcibly illustrated.

Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560; Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 186; Calder v. Kirby, 5 Gray, 598; Metropolitan Bd. of Excise v. Barrie, 34 N. Y. 607.

An elevator proprietor who procures a license under the requirements of this act, "to transact business as a public warehouseman," is not a "creation of the state" any more than any one of the multitude of individuals who take out licenses to pursue the variety of callings and avocations as to which this requirement is imposed by statute or ordinance.

Jurisdiction to restrain corporations "within the scope of the purposes of their creation" is sustained, not as a jurisdiction to prevent the commissions of illegal acts, but to prevent these artificial beings, creations of the state, from exercising franchises and powers not granted by their charters.

Atty. Gen. v. Great Northern R. Co. 1 Drew. & S. 154.

The long-existing practice of warehousemen, whether of grain or other property, to store their own property was not contrary to public policy or unlawful at common law.

The occupation of an elevator proprietor is that of a public warehouseman, and therefore governed by the same rules of law.

Low v. Martin, 18 Ill. 286; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77.

The storing by a warehouseman of his own grain with the grain of others is not contrary to public policy or unlawful at common law.

People, Illinois Inst. for Edu. of Deaf & Dumb, v. Miner, 46 Ill. 367; McAuley v. Columbus, C. & I. Cent. R. Co. 83 Ill. 348; Low v. Martin, 18 Ill. 286; Cole v. Tyng, 24 Ill. 100, 76 Am. Dec. 735; Dole v. Olmstead, 36 Ill. 150, 85 Am. Dec. 397; Leonard v. Dunton, 51 Ill. 482, 99 Am. Dec. 508.

Express decisions in Ohio, Iowa, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, and other states and in the United States Supreme Court, and text-writers, recognize the practice as both customary and lawful.

O'Dell v. Leyda, 46 Ohio St. 244; James v. Plank, 48 Ohio St. 255; Seaton v. Graham, 53 Iowa, 181; Rice v. Nixon, 97 Ind. 97, 49 Am. Rep. 430; Ledyard v. Hibbard, 48 Mich. 422, 42 Am. NOTE.—As to public warehousemen, see also Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Central Stock Yards & Transit Co. (N. J. Eq.) 6 L. R. A. 805; Hall v. Pillsbury (Minn.) 7 L. R. A. 529; Gell-43 L. R. A.

fuss v. Corrigan (Wis.) 37 L. R. A. 166; and Franklin Nat. Bank v. Whitehead (Ind.) 39 L. R. A. 725.

The warehouse act of 1871 did not make it unlawful for the warehouseman to store his own grain in his own warehouse.

All statutes in derogation of the common law must be construed strictly.

Pinley v. Steele, 23 Ill. 59; Smith v. Laatsch, 114 Ill. 279.

The right of the warehousemen under this act to store their own grain has been recognized, and in effect affirmed by this court, as authorized by the statute.

Broadwell v. Howard, 77 Ill. 305; National Bank v. Langan, 28 Ill. App. 401; Ardinger v. Wright, 38 Ill. App. 98.

The long practical construction given to the act, as to the right of warehousemen to receive and to store their own grain with the grain of others, should be conclusive of the question of construction.

Mr. John P. Wilson, also for appellants:

No implied contract on the part of a public warehouseman is created by his accepting a license under the warehouse act.

In none of the decisions has it ever been suggested or held that acts regulating public warehouses created the business, or conferred special privileges upon special warehousemen; but, on the contrary, it is settled by these decisions that these acts are valid only as attempting to regulate an existing public business under the police power; that the owners of the public elevators prior to the passage of the law had, by carrying on the public warehouse business, given the public such an interest in their property as gave the state the right to regulate such business.

If not prohibited by statute, a grain dealer storing his own grain in his own warehouse has also the right to store the grain of others in his warehouse for hire.

The evidence as to the existence of the practice of the proprietors of public warehouses in this state to deal in and store their own grain prior to 1871 is uncontroverted, and is confirmed by the adjudicated cases in which this method of doing business is shown.

No practical construction favorable to appellants is shown.

It is unlawful for a class "A" warehouseman to store his own grain in his public warehouse.

The right of the warehousemen to mix the grain of different owners is in this state purely statutory, and hence exists only to the extent that the statute confers it.

The statute of 1871 does not permit a warehouseman to store his own grain.

The older view held that the deposit passed the title in the grain to the warehouseman placing the transaction on the same basis as the deposit of money in a bank. But this view occasioned much injustice to depositors of grain, and now generally, either by statute or judicial determination, it is the law that a deposit of grain in an elevator is a mere bailment, and does not pass the title to the grain.

28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 668.

In this state this change was effected by statute.

When the identical thing delivered is to be restored, though in an altered form, the contract is one of bailment, and the title to the property is not changed, but when there is no obligation to restore the specific thing, and the receiver is at liberty to return another thing of equal value, he becomes a debtor to make the return, and the title to the property is changed—it is a sale.

At this stage in the development of the law there was no such thing as an authorized mixing by the warehouseman of grain deposited with him.

With the growth of the grain trade in this country and the consequent inconvenience resulting from requiring each depositor's grain to be kept separate, some courts became inclined to hold that where, by agreement, grain of the same kind belonging to several persons was deposited in the same bin of a warehouse, such depositors thereby became tenants in common of the entire mass.

This new legal theory was crude and inadequately suited to the warehouse business. There was not so much difficulty so long as the entire mass remained the same, but in the requirements of warehousing there must be constant withdrawals and substitutions, so that the original mass is not long preserved.

Chase v. Washburn, 1 Ohio St. 244, 59 Am. Dec. 623; Sexton v. Graham, 53 Iowa, 181; Preston v. Witherspoon, 109 Ind. 457, 58 Am. Rep. 417.

If the law of this state prior to the passage of the statute authorized warehousemen to mix the grain of different depositors why was it necessary to pass this provision of the statute? Does it not show that this right did not previously exist, and that the statute was passed to effect a change in the law?

Hall v. Pillsbury, 43 Minn. 33, 7 L. R. A. 529; National Exch. Bank v. Wilder, 34 Minn. 156.

Unless the present statute affirmatively confers upon these appellants this right to mix their own grain with other grain in their warehouses, they cannot do so.

The underlying object of the legislation is to protect the public.

If any doubt exists in the minds of the court in the construction of that act, that view ought to be taken which makes for the public.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants in these nine cases were defendants in the circuit court of Cook county to informations in equity filed by the attorney general against them as licensed proprietors of warehouses of class A in Chicago, or stockholders of corporations so licensed. The informations made the same general allegations in each case,—that defendants had stored grain owned by themselves in the particular warehouse of which they were proprietors; that not less than three fourths of all the grain received in the public warehouses in Chicago was owned by the warehousemen; that the grades for inspection of grain were such that the grain of each grade was not of the same quality, but that separate car loads of different quality and value were graded in the same grade; that by reason of advantages of the defendants, as owners of warehouses, in mixing and manipulating grain, and rebating storage charges, and otherwise, they had been enabled to drive out competition, and to hold and enjoy the privilege of buying grain free from competition; and that such storing of grain was unlawful and injurious to the public. All the informations prayed for the same relief,—a perpetual injunction to restrain defendants, as warehousemen, from storing grain in their own warehouses. The answers admitted in each case that defendants were operating public warehouses of class A, in which grain was stored in Chicago, and that they had stored grain owned by them in their own warehouses, and claimed the right to do so. The answers also set up a general custom of thirty years' standing, under which the proprietors of public warehouses were accustomed to store their own grain and mix it with the grain of their customers, and also that the warehouse commissioners had construed the act of 1871 as permitting that custom, and that such purchasers of grain and such custom had a beneficial effect upon producers, shippers of grain, and dealers in grain throughout Illinois and the Northwest. A great amount of evidence was taken, and a decree was entered in each case granting the relief prayed for. Where the defendant was a corporation, the stockholders were enjoined from storing their own grain in the elevators of their own corporations. These appeals were prosecuted from the decrees so entered. The cases were argued together, and were all submitted upon the same briefs and arguments.

It is contended that a court of equity has no jurisdiction in a case of this character, and especially because by the provisions of the warehouse act the license is made revocable for any violation of law, so that the statute affords a sufficient remedy for any illegal act by the licensee. This objection was not made by the answers, and the fact that the statute provides an efficient remedy for a violation of duty by a warehouseman and licensee cannot be raised for the first time in this court, if the case is one in which a court of equity might under any circumstances obtain jurisdiction. There are subjects which cannot be brought before a court of chancery, even by consent of the parties; but if a defendant makes no objection to a hearing of the cause, and participates in it, he must be regarded as consenting to the jurisdiction, and, if the subject-matter is such that jurisdiction can be conferred in that way, he will not be heard to complain of the want of it. In such a case, if a defendant goes to a hearing without objection he cannot, in case of defeat, make the objection here. Stout v. Cook, 41 Ill. 447; Dodge v. Wright, 48 Ill. 382; Hickey v. Forristal, 49 Ill. 255; Magee v. Magee, 51 Ill. 500, 99 Am. Dec. 571; Gridley v. Watson, 53 Ill. 186; Knox County Supers. v. Davis, 63 Ill. 405; Ryan v. Duncan, 88 Ill. 144; Richards v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 124 Ill. 516; Crawford v. Schmitz, 139 Ill. 564; Clemmer v. Drovers' Nat. Bank, 157 Ill. 206. Clearly, this is such a case. The relief sought by the informations, and the subject-matter, are neither of them foreign to equity jurisdiction. The Constitution declares that warehouses such as defendants are licensed to carry on are public warehouses, and that it shall be the duty of the general assembly to pass all necessary laws to give full effect to that article of the Constitution, which shall be liberally construed to protect producers and shippers. In compliance with the requirements of the Constitution the warehouse act of 1871 was enacted, by which defendants were permitted to exercise the business of public warehousemen, and to conduct such public warehouses. They procured their licenses, and thereby voluntarily submitted their property to the law. The right of the state to control them in that business is conceded, and the right of the state, through its attorney general, to restrain them in the use of their public warehouses, within the limitations of the law, and to prevent resulting public injury, is not foreign to the powers or jurisdiction of a court of equity. Defendants could not operate their warehouses and devote them to such uses without a license, and the giving of a bond to faithfully comply with the law. The attorney general alleged injury to the public from violations of the laws governing them and their warehouses, and this authorizes the court of equity to protect the public right,—at least, where there is no objection that the law furnished an adequate remedy.

It is a firmly established rule that, where one person occupies a relation in which he owes a duty to another, he shall not place himself in any position which will expose him to temptation of acting contrary to that duty, or bring his interest in conflict with his duty. This rule applies to every person who stands in such a situation that he owes a duty to another, and courts of equity have never fettered themselves by defining particular relations to which alone it will be applied. They have applied it to agents, partners, guardians, executors, administrators, directors, and managing officers of corporations, as well as to trustees, but have never fixed or defined its limits. The rule is founded upon the plain consideration that the one charged with duty shall act with regard to the discharge of that duty, and he will not be permitted to expose himself to temptation, or be brought into a situation where his personal interests conflict with his duty. Courts of equity have never allowed a person occupying such a relation to undertake the service of two whose interests are in conflict, and then endeavor to see that he does not violate his duty, but forbid such a course of dealing, irrespective of his good faith or bad faith. If the duty of the defendants as public warehousemen stands in opposition to personal interest as buyers and dealers in grain storing the same in their own warehouses, then the law interposes a preventative check against any temptation to act from personal interest, by prohibiting them from occupying any such position.

The public warehouses established under the law are public agencies, and the defendants, as licensees, pursue a public employment. They are clothed with a duty towards the public. The evidence shows that defendants, as public warehousemen storing grain in their own warehouses, are enabled to, and do, overbid legitimate grain dealers, by exacting from them the established rate for storage, while they give up a part of the storage charges when they buy or sell for themselves. By this practice of buying and selling through their own elevators, the position of equality between them and the public whom they are bound to serve is destroyed; and by the advantage of their position they are enabled to crush out, and have nearly crushed out, competition in the largest grain market of the world. The result is that the warehousemen own three fourths of all the grain stored in the public warehouses of Chicago, and upon some of the railroads the only buyers of grain are the warehousemen on that line. The grades established for different qualities of grain are such that the grain is not exactly of the same quality in each grade, and the difference in market price in different qualities of the same grade varies from 2 cents per bushel in the better grades to 15 cents in the lower grades. The great bulk of grain is brought by rail and in car loads, and is inspected on the tracks, and the duty of the warehousemen is to mix the car loads of grain as they come. Such indiscriminate mixing gives an average quality of grain to all holders of warehouse receipts. Where the warehouseman is a buyer, the manipulation of the grain may result in personal advantage to him. Not only is this so, but the warehouse proprietors often overbid other dealers as much as a quarter of a cent a bushel, and immediately resell the same to a private buyer at a quarter of a cent less than they paid, exacting storage, which more than balances their loss. In this way they use their business as warehousemen to drive out competition with them as buyers. It would be idle to expect a warehouseman to perform his duty to the public as an impartial holder of the grain of the different proprietors, if he is permitted to occupy a position where his self-interest is at variance with his duty. In exercising the public employment for which he is licensed, he cannot be permitted to use the advantage of his position to crush out competition, and to combine in establishing a monopoly by which a great accumulation of grain is in the hands of the warehousemen, liable to be suddenly thrown upon the market whenever they, as speculators, see profit in such course. The defendants are large dealers in futures on the Chicago Board of Trade, and together hold an enormous supply of grain ready to aid their opportunities as speculators. The warehouseman issues his own warehouse receipt to himself. As public warehouseman he gives a receipt to himself as individual, and is enabled to use his own receipts for the purpose of trade, and to build up a monopoly and destroy competition. That this course of dealing is inconsistent with the full and impartial performance of his duty to the public seems clear. The defendants answer that the practice had a beneficial effect upon producers and shippers, and naturally were able to prove that when, by reason of their advantages, they were overbidding other dealers, there was benefit to sellers, but there was an entire failure to show that in the general average there was any public good to producers or shippers.

The answers also set up, and it is claimed here, that there was at the time of the passage of the warehouse act a general custom of warehousemen to deal in grain, and to store it in their warehouses, and that the law was passed with reference to that existing custom. The evidence fails to establish any such custom. The amount so bought and stored or dealt in up to the year 1885 was trifling, and the first time when there was any material increase was in 1890. Many witnesses who would have known if such a practice or usage existed united in denying all knowledge of it, and many of them testified that they never knew or heard of any elevator owner buying or selling grain prior to 1885. There was no such custom.

Finally it is claimed that there has been a practical construction of the law by the warehouse commissioners, permitting the practice complained of. There was a little buying and storing of grain by warehousemen from time to time, but it was so insignificant as to call no attention to it until in recent years. It is said, however, that since the practice became common the warehouse commissioners, charged with the administration and enforcement of the law, did not question the legality of the practice. There was nothing in the nature of affirmative construction, and the most that can be said is that the warehouse commissioners failed to appeal to the attorney general to institute a suit, and failed to prosecute the offenders. That fact does not amount to practical construction. If the commissioners were derelict, it would not bind the public, and indifference on their part could not have that effect.

Neither are the public barred by laches. The stockholders who were made defendants occupy such a relation to their corporations that they cannot be permitted to use the property which they have devoted to public use to carry on their individual business with substantially the same effect and the same deleterious result to the public interest as if done by the corporation. These persons were made defendants as stockholders, and the only relief sought against them was in that relation. The charges and findings against them were on account of the existence of that relation, and, as we interpret the decree, the permanent injunctions are against them as stockholders. They are permanent only so long as the relation and interest on which they are based shall exist.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Edward H. FOLEY et al., Respts.,
v.
MANUFACTURERS' & BUILDERS' FIRE
INSURANCE COMPANY of New York,
Appt.

(152 N. Y. 131.)

An owner has an insurable interest to the extent of its value in a building in process of construction at the time of a fire under a contract requiring the delivery of the completed building within a specified time, not yet expired, although the loss in the absence of insurance would fall on the contractor, and not on the owner.

(March 2, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Onondaga County Circuit in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

NOTE.—Insurable interest in unfinished building during its construction by a contractor.

It is not necessary to constitute an insurable interest that a party should have either a legal or equitable title in the property insured; but any interest may be insured if the peril against which the insurance is made would bring upon the insured by its immediate and direct effect a technical loss.

Materialmen, contractors, builders, and owners have an insurable interest in a building that is being constructed. There seem to be but few cases on the question as to the insurable interest of the owner, probably for the reason that most buildings being constructed are at the contractor's risk, and in nearly all the cases the policies are taken out by the builder.

The case of FOLEY v. MANUFACTURERS' & BUILDERS' F. INSURANCE CO. holds that where a contractor agrees to furnish material and to complete buildings on the foundations on certain lands within a specified time, to be paid after completion, the owner has an insurable interest, although he may not be bound to pay the contractor in case of destruction before the building is finished. In this case the court said that the fact that improvements on the land may have cost the owner nothing, or that if destroyed by fire he may compel another person to replace them without expense to him, or that he may recoup his loss by resort to a contract liability of a third person, does not affect the liability of an insurer, and the company cannot compel the owner to put the loss on the contractors, nor resort to the building contract to diminish the liability for an actual loss.

And a builder who is entitled to a mechanic's lien for work on a building has an insurable interest in the same. Stout v. City F. Ins. Co. 12 Iowa, 371, 79 Am. Dec. 539; Harvey v. Cherry, 76 N. Y. 440.

And so have materialmen. Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Coates, 14 Md. 285.

In this case the claim for a mechanic's lien under the statute had not been filed. A recovery was allowed to the extent of the mechanic's lien. And mechanics having a lien on a building have an insurable interest in such building. Carter v. Humboldt F. Ins. Co. 12 Iowa, 287, 43 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hiscock, Doheny, & Hiscock, for appellant:

Plaintiffs were only entitled to recover of defendant one half of the damages caused to the foundations, etc., constructed by themselves, plus at the utmost one half of the amount at the time of the fire paid by them to the contractor.

Plaintiffs are not entitled to any speculative damages or profits, and they are not entitled to collect damages for an interest in the property outside of what they actually possessed, and which damages being retained by themselves would be profits, or, being turned over to their contractor, would protect from loss a person and interest which were not covered by the policy at all.

Porter, Ins. *221; May, Ins. §§ 2, 7, 11; Planters' & M. Ins. Co. v. Thurston, 93 Ala. 255; Illinois Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Andes Ins. Co. 67 Ill. 362, 16 Am. Rep. 620.

Under the contract which plaintiffs made with the contractor the title to the houses

In the Iowa cases the mechanics commenced a proceeding after the fire, and established their lien by a judgment in the district court. In the latter case the court said that the lien of the mechanic intended to be a security for the price and value of the work performed attaches to the land and building erected thereon from the commencement of the time that the labor is being performed and the materials furnished, and does not have to be established to be insurable.

A builder having a lien which may be enforced against the equity of redemption has an insurable interest, and if he has a valid lien at the time of the loss it is immaterial whether he subsequently performs acts on which his lien may thereafter depend. Royal Ins. Co. v. Stinson, 103 U. S. 25, 26 L. ed. 473.

The amount of the insurable interest in this case was held to be such a sum as the builder could have obtained a judgment for against the equity of redemption on that property.

Where a builder contracts to furnish material and erect a house, and the owner and builder make an application for insurance, and a policy is issued in the name of the owner, with a clause "contractor's insurance for thirty days" with the intention to insure the contractor for thirty days, and after that time to insure the owner for three years, such a policy may be enforced for the benefit of the builder. German F. Ins. Co. v. Thompson, 43 Kan. 567.

In this case it was intended to insure the interest of the contractor, and the question in the case really turns upon the question of parol evidence to explain an ambiguous policy.

The contractor has an insurable interest to the full value of the building, where the contract provides that the contractor is not liable for loss or damage to the building caused by fire, but that the building is to be kept insured with builder's risks until the written acceptance of the building by the architects, and the policy is to be paid for by the contractors, and the contractor does not insure in favor of the owner, but insures in his own name, as his liability to the owner is such that he must rebuild or pay the damages. Cushing v. Williamsburg City F. Ins. Co. 4 Wash. 538.

In Southern Ins. & T. Co. v. Lewis, 42 Ga.

remained in the latter until they were entirely completed and the contract fulfilled and the houses had been accepted or were ready for acceptance by plaintiffs.

Andrews v. Durant, 11 N. Y. 35, 62 Am. Dec. 55; Tompkins v. Dudley, 25 N. Y. 272; Commercial F. Ins. Co. v. Capital City Ins. Co. 81 Ala. 320, 60 Am. Rep. 162; Lawing v. Rintles, 97 N. C. 350.

The property destroyed belonged to the contractor and the damages by its destruction are his.

Lawing v. Rintles, 97 N. C. 350; Security Ins. Co. v. Farrell, 2 Ins. L. J. 302.

This case seems to be within the principles of those which permit an insured mortgagee to recover only to the amount actually unpaid on his mortgage; or an insured bailee, carrier, or commission merchant to recover only to the amount of actual interest.

Mr. W. P. Goodelle, with Messrs. Riegel & Walker, for respondents:

The contract itself (the policy) between the parties provides in express terms that, in case of loss or damage, such loss or damage shall be ascertained or estimated according to the actual cash value of the property destroyed.

The defendant agrees to make good to the plaintiffs, not all their loss, but all the loss or damage which shall happen by fire to the property, and that loss or damage to be ascertained or estimated, not according to what plaintiffs have actually paid or expended on it, but "according to the actual cash value of the property."

State Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Updegraff, 21 Pa. 513; Kernochan v. New-York Bowery F. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 428; De Forest v. Fulton F. Ins. Co. 1 Hall, 84; Excelsior F. Ins. Co. v. Royal Ins. Co. 55 N. Y. 359, 14 Am. Rep. 271; Clover v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 277.

The insurance here was not an insurance against loss on the amount plaintiffs had or should have paid on the property, but an insurance on the property itself.

Kernochan v. New-York Bowery F. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 428; Clover v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 277.

If the plaintiffs had an insurable interest

587, it was held under Ala. Code, § 2753, providing that to sustain any contract of insurance it must appear that the insured has some interest in the property or event insured, and such as he has represented himself to have, that contractors had an insurable interest in a store erected by them on B's land under a parol contract to grant them this land in consideration that they were to build for B a new house on an adjoining lot, which was in process of completion when the store was destroyed by fire.

And builders contracting to build a house have an insurable interest. If the right to compensation depends upon the completion of the house, that is, if by contract or custom they are not to be paid until the house is finished. Protection Ins. Co. v. Hall, 15 B. Mon. 411.

In this case the court said that as the house was not finished and the plaintiffs were at work for its completion when the insurance was obtained, if an arrangement by which particular lots were to be taken in payment by the contractors had been changed by the appropriation of these lots to the payment for other work, there was an inchoate lien on the work at the time of the insurance, but being in parol was unenforceable, and that the existence of such an agreement as to the mode of payment should have been communicated to the insurers to enable them to determine whether they would make the insurance. The effect of the failure to communicate such fact depends entirely upon its materiality to the risk. The court further said that if the plaintiffs had received a conveyance of any of the land in payment for their work done on the house to which the policy relates, or if they had an enforceable contract for such conveyance, the insurance company was entitled to a deduction to the extent of the value of the land fixed in the contract.

In Mosser v. Donaldson (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 153, it was said that materialmen furnishing lumber, having a right to assert a mechanic's lien, may insure their interest in the building.

A policy expressing the interest of the assured to be that of "mortgagee" was reformed and held to cover a "mechanic's lien" where that was the intention of the parties. Longhurst v. Star Ins. Co. 19 Iowa, 864.

In this case the court said that in granting a policy upon a mechanic's lien the company admits that it is an insurable interest.

A builder contracting to furnish materials and build a house at a stipulated price, payable in instalments as the work progresses, has an insurable interest where the house is not finished or delivered. Commercial F. Ins. Co. v. Capital City Ins. Co. 81 Ala. 320, 60 Am. Rep. 162.

In this case the builder was to receive for building the house $2,065, and he insured the same for $2,000. The owner also took out a policy for $2,000 in another company, and the contractor assigned his policy after the fire to the owner, who transferred the policy to the second company, who brought this action.

The court said that the contractor's insurable interest depends on the question whether he was bound to rebuild the house in the event of its destruction before completion and delivery, or, failing to do so, he was bound to refund the money paid on the contract for building.

And contractors have an insurable interest in a building where they contract to erect a building and it is burned, and they are obliged to replace the same, and do restore it to its original condition. Sullivan v. Spring Garden Ins. Co. 34 App. Div. 128.

In this case the policy insured A as owner, and B and C as contractors "as interest may appear." "Builder's risk granted to complete the above-described building." The owner made no claim under the policy.

And a contractor employed to move a building has an insurable interest in the house. Planters' & M. Ins. Co. v. Thurston, 93 Ala. 255.

In Eichelberger v. Miller, 20 Md. 332, it was said that the contractor had an insurable interest on lumber sent to his shop and burned while being prepared, and he might have protected himself from loss by obtaining a policy of insurance thereon, and not having done so he must bear the loss, where he agreed to do all the work on a dwelling house about to be erected, to be paid for as the work progressed and as fast as the lumber was put in the house.

The court said that the insurable interest of the contractor is the value of his work performed on the material.

at the time the insurance was effected and also at the time of the loss, the value of that interest, in the insured property, is not material, and they are entitled to recover the whole amount of damages to the property not exceeding the sum insured.

The plaintiffs were, at the time of the fire, the absolute and legal owners of the houses, and their insurable interest was the full value of the buildings.

If the insured has an insurable interest, the underwriter is bound by his contract with him and must pay the full amount of the loss or damage to the insured property. • May, Ins. § 116, pp. 196, 197.

Analogous to our contention is the principle involved, in case of a warehouseman, who procures insurance in his own name on the goods of his customers.

The only interest the insured has in the goods so insured is his lien for charges thereon; yet in case of loss he is entitled to recover from the insurance company the full value of the goods destroyed, not, of course, exceeding the amount named in the policy, and is not limited to his charges or actual interest.

A sheriff having goods in his possession under process has an insurable interest to the full value of the goods, although he is not bound to insure.

White v. Madison, 26 N. Y. 117.

The contract between the plaintiff and the contractor is of no concern to the defendant; it neither lessens nor increases its liability on its contract of insurance.

Clover v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 277; Strong v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co. 10 Pick. 43, 20 Am. Rep. 507; Bicknell v. Lancaster City & County F. Ins. Co. 58 N. Y. 677; King v. State Mutual F. Ins. Co. 7 Cush. 7, 14 Am. Dec. 683; Washington Mills Emery Mfg. Co. v. Weymouth & B. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 135 Mass. 506.

By the terms of the policy, the indemnity was against the loss or damage which might come to the insured property, and it was that loss or damage which the underwriter undertook to make good.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

the plaintiffs had an insurable interest equal to the full value of the incomplete buildings in course of construction on their lot when the fire occurred. It is the contention on the part of the defendant that as the houses were being constructed under a contract by which the contractors were to furnish the materials and build the houses (above the foundations), and to complete them by a time specified, which had not expired at the time of the fire, for a specified sum to be paid within ten days after their completion, the plaintiffs had no interest to protect in the structures while in their incomplete state, since their destruction by fire would be the loss of the contractors, and not of the owners, whose obligation to build and complete the houses, as the condition of payment, would continue after as before the fire. It may be admitted that the contractors would remain bound by the contract, notwithstanding the destruction of the buildings by fire, and that the owners would not be bound to pay for the work done or materials supplied up to the time of the fire. Tompkins v. Dudley, 25 N. Y. 272. The contention of the defendant rests upon a misconception of the insurer's contract, and as to the insurable interest of the plaintiffs in the structures. The defendant, by its contract, undertook to insure the plaintiffs against loss by fire, not exceeding the sum specified, to the "described property," the loss or damage to be ascertained "according to the actual cash value" of the property at the time of the fire. The parties by this contract made the value of the property insured, within the limit, the measure of the insurer's liability. It is an undoubted principle in fire insurance that there must be an insurable interest in the insured, or an insurable interest which he represents in the subject of insurance, existing at the time of the happening of the event insured against, to enable him to maintain an action on a fire policy. This flows from the nature of the contract of fire insurance, which is a contract of indemnity; and, where there is no interest, there is no room for indemnity. The plaintiffs had an interest in the subject of insurance, both at the inception of the contract and at the time of the fire. They owned the land upon which the structures were being erected. They themselves had constructed the foundations of the buildings, and, in describing the property insured, the foundations were specifically named. They were in possession of the premises, and the ownership of the fee of the land on which the contractors were erecting the buildings carried with it the ownership of the structures as they progressed, which, according to the general rule of law, became part of the realty by annexation. It is not claimed, nor could it upon the evidence be claimed, that there was any intention either on the part of the owners or the contractors to sever the ownership of the structures from the ownership of the land while the work was in progress, or that the contractors should retain title to the materials put into the buildings until their completion. The defendant is compelled to admit that the loss sued for is within the exact terms of the policy. It is conceded that the recovery does not exceed the property loss occasioned by the fire, and, if counsel can be deemed to have denied that the legal ownership of the structures was in the owners of the land at the time of the fire, the denial is very indistinct, and certainly is not justified by the facts or the law. The defense comes to this: That as the plaintiffs, by their contract with third persons, have imposed upon them the risk and expense of furnishing complete structures, and have assumed no liability until the structures are completed, they had no insurable interest, and have sustained no loss. But the contract relations between the plaintiffs and the contractors is a matter in which the defendant has no concern. When the policy was issued, it could not be known whether the contractors would perform their contract. If they abandoned it, the owners would derive such advantage as would accrue from the partial construction of the buildings prior to such abandonment. It is possible that, if the defendant is compelled to pay the policy, the plaintiffs may, if they insist upon their rights against the contractors, get double compensation, unless they should be adjudged to hold the fund recovered for the contractors. But, however this may be, the owners had an insurable interest to the whole value of the buildings on their land; and the defendants neither can compel the plaintiffs to put the loss on the contractors, nor can they resort to the terms of the building contract to diminish the liability for an actual loss within the terms of the policy.

The fact that improvements on land may have cost the owner nothing, or that, if destroyed by fire, he may compel another person to replace them without expense to him, or that he may recoup his loss by resort to a contract liability of a third person, in no way affects the liability of an insurer, in the absence of any exemption in the policy. See Clover v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 277; Kernochan v. New York Bowery F. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 428; Riggs v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co. 125 N. Y. 7, 10 L. R. APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover rent. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Elihu Root and Robert Thorne, for appellants:

A tenant in common has a legal right at all times to enter upon and occupy and possess each and every part of the common property, and the exercise by him of that legal right imposes upon him no obligation to pay for use and occupation, even though he occupy the whole, much less can it raise against him by the operation of a naked presumption of law a liability to pay rent.

A tenant in common occupying the entire premises himself is under no obligation to pay rent or to account to his cotenant.

Henderson v. Eason, 9 Eng. L. & Eq. 337; Woolever v. Knapp, 18 Barb. 265; Freeman, Cotenancy & Partition, 2d ed. § 248.

Upon the expiration of the lease, Healey, by virtue of his legal right as a co-owner in fee of the land, could continue to use and occupy his property without incurring any liability or penalty by so doing.

The presence of the defendant Zabriskie does not alter in any sense or degree the legal aspect of the case. The occupation was by Healey, the co-owner.

Messrs. William Allen Butler and Adrian H. Joline, for respondent:

The holding over by Healey & Company after the expiration of the term of the lease created a liability to pay rent for another year.

Haynes v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 287.

The liability thus created by the holding over of Healey & Company after the expiration of the term of the lease was not affected by the fact that Warren M. Healey was a member of the limited partnership of Healey & Company, the lessees.

The rule is well settled in England that a tenant in common may maintain an action for use and occupation against a cotenant where the obligation to pay rent was created by a lease.

Leigh v. Dickeson, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 194.

One tenant in common cannot do any act which will prejudice the rights of his cotenants, nor give a license to perform any act on the common property which will bind his cotenant, or to make a lease which will bind his cotenant.

Murray v. Haverty, 70 Ill. 318.

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover a quarter's rent of premises Nos. 311-319, West Forty-Third street, in the city of New York, alleged to be due and owing from the defendants to the plaintiff. It appears that the plaintiff and defendant Warren M. Healey are the tenants in common and owners of the premises; the plaintiff owning an undivided three fourths, and the defendant Healey an undivided one fourth. The defendants were general partners, and one William Williams was a special partner, constituting the firm of Healey & Co. On the 30th day of May, 1891, the defendants leased the premises from the plaintiff and Healey for the term of one year from the 1st day of May, 1891, at the yearly rent of $8,500, payable quarterly, with the privilege to the defendants of continuing the lease for two years more upon giving notice in writing to each of the owners on or before the 1st day of February, 1892, and not otherwise. The lease was in writing, and was signed by the defendant Healey and Healey & Co., but was not signed by the plaintiff. The notice to renew the lease was not given, and the defendants continued to occupy the premises for a few weeks after the expiration of the year. This action is prosecuted upon the theory that the holding over by Healey & Co., after the expiration of the term of the lease, created a liability to pay the rent for another year, under the rule that, where tenants hold over after the expiration of the term, the law will imply an agreement to hold for a year upon the terms of the prior lease, if the landlord elects to so regard it. Haynes v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 287, 289. The defendants, in their answer, admitted that after the 1st day of May, 1892, they continued and remained in the occupation and possession of the premises, but they denied that they thereby elected to continue their tenancy for another year, and alleged that prior to the 1st day of May, 1892, they notified, in writing, Valentine and Healey, the owners, that they elected to discontinue their tenancy on the expiration of the term, and declined to renew the lease, and that they remained in the occupation of the premises under a new and an express agreement entered into with Warren M. Healey, 43 L. R. A.

one of the owners. Upon the trial, the defendants offered in evidence two letters bearing date April 29, 1892,—the day before the lease terminated,—which are as follows:

Warren M. Healey, Esq., 1478 Broadway.

Dear Sir:—

We desire to inform you that as indicated by our failure to exercise the option expressed in your lease to us for the past year, and as verbally stated to you yesterday by our representative, Mr. Thorne, that we shall not renew said lease. We understand that the premises have not been rented for the coming year, and shall be pleased to continue to occupy the same for a few weeks from the first of May next, in order to suit our convenience in moving, paying pro rata rent for such use and occupation.

Very truly yours,

[Signed] Healey & Co.

New York, 29 April, 1892.

Messrs. Healey & Co., 1478 Broadway.

Gentlemen:—Your letter of even date to hand. You are at liberty to continue to occupy the premises numbers 313 to 319 West 43d street at a pro rata rent for the period of such occupancy. This privilege is accorded you only with the understanding and agreement that such occupancy is to be terminated on a week's notice from either party, in order that we may take advantage of any opportunity that may offer to rent the premises for another year.

Very truly,

[Signed] Warren M. Healey.

Healey testified that the first of these letters was received by him from Healey & Co., and identifies the second letter as written by himself and delivered to Healey & Co. The letters were excluded by the trial court, and an exception was taken by the defendants. After the plaintiff rested, the defendants moved for a dismissal of the complaint upon the ground that the defendant Healey, being an owner in fee of one fourth of the premises, had a legal right at any and all times to occupy each and every part of the common property, and that his exercise of that legal right in the absence of any evidence tending to show infringement of the rights of his cotenants or a legal ouster, could not raise against him, by a presumption of law, any liability. This motion was denied, and an exception was taken. Upon the conclusion of the evidence the court directed the jury to render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed by him. To this direction an exception was also taken by the defendants.

In the case of McKay v. Mumford, 10 Wend. 351, Nelson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "As to a tenant who has no title, except by the lease under which he enters, if he continues after its expiration, his possession, in contemplation of law, is in subordination to the landlord's rights, because the law will not presume him disloyal. But no such presumption exists against the tenant in common. The fact of his not leaving possession does not authorize the inference that he still intends to hold under the lease; on the contrary, the presumption is that he holds under his own title, which gives him a right to the possession and enjoyment of the whole estate, liable, however, to account to his cotenant at law." This rule was recognized by the general term in this case. 86 Hun, 259. But that court distinguished that case from this. Healey is not the sole lessee. The lease ran to a firm of which he was a member. In this respect the cases are distinguishable; but we fail to see why Healey, at the termination of the lease, may not assume his authority over the premises as an owner and a tenant in common. As such tenant in common he had the right to take and occupy the whole of the premises, and preserve them from waste or injury, so long as he did not interfere with the right of his cotenant to also occupy the premises. Had the letter of Healey & Co. of April 29, 1892, been received in evidence, it would have shown conclusively that the company did not intend to hold over and renew the lease, but that they sought permission to remain in the premises for a short time, to suit their convenience in moving; and if the letter of Healey of the same date had been received in evidence it would have shown that he not only gave his consent to the company to hold over, but that he assumed his relation to the premises as owner. It would also have explained the admission in the answer that the firm continued in possession after the expiration of the lease and established the facts that justified such action on the part of the tenants.

There is another view of the case which we think may properly be adopted. It may be, and doubtless is, the law, that a tenant in common cannot bind a cotenant, without his consent, by a contract or a lease with reference to the property of which they are the owners; but in this case, as we have seen, the lease was executed by Healey, and was not executed by the plaintiff, but for a whole year the plaintiff accepted the rent and acquiesced in the lease made, and by the bringing of this action has adopted it as his lease, basing his right to recover of the defendants upon it on the ground that they are presumed to have taken the premises for another year upon the same terms and conditions expressed in the lease. It appears to us that the plaintiff, by thus adopting the lease, has recognized the authority of Healey to make it in his behalf. It ran for one year, with the privilege of two years, at the option of the defendants, and, under the circumstances, the other members of the firm had the right to assume that Healey had the authority to treat with them with reference to the leasehold premises. Under this view the letters excluded were proper evidence in the case. Had they been received, they would have shown that the retention of the premises by the defendants was under a permit given by one of the owners, whose authority to act for the other owner they had the right to assume by reason of his adoption of the lease under which they had previously occupied the premises.

O'Brien, J., dissenting:

The question in this case is whether a partnership firm which goes into possession of real property under a lease from the owners is exempt from the general rules of law governing the relations of landlord and tenant, by reason of the circumstance that one member of the firm happens to be the owner of a small, undivided share of the property as a tenant in common. It is not a case of one tenant in common leasing to another, but a case where all the co-owners unite in a demise of the whole property to a distinct legal entity, known in law as a "limited partnership," of which one of the owners is also a member. The courts below have held that in such a case the obligations of the lease, and the rules of law applicable to the relations of landlord and tenant, are not changed or in any way affected by the circumstance that the owner of the small share in the realty demised is, at the same time, a member of the legal entity or artificial person to which the demise is made. This decision, in my opinion, was clearly right, and no one would ever question it but for the introduction into the discussion of principles that have nothing whatever to do with the law of landlord and tenant, since they apply only to the relations of common owners of estates.

This is a case between landlord and tenant, and not between tenants in common, and it is only when we confuse the one with the other, or attempt to apply to the former relation rules of law applicable solely to the latter, that there can be any doubt about the case. The facts are all admitted on the record, and they are so clear and simple that it is impossible to be misled by any suggestion outside of the controversy. The plaintiff is the owner of an undivided three fourths of certain real estate in the city of New York, and the defendant Healey is the owner of the other fourth. The plaintiff and the defendant, Healey, as such owners, united in a written lease to the defendants, composing the firm of Healey & Co., for one year from the 1st of May, 1891, and at a yearly rental of $8,500, payable quarterly, as follows: To the plaintiff, as owner of three fourths, the sum of $1,593.75, and to the defendant Healey, as the owner of the remaining fourth, $531.25, on the first day of each quarter. The firm of which the defendant Healey was a member entered into possession of the premises pursuant to this lease, and remained therein until after the 1st of May, 1892, thereby electing, as the plaintiff claims, to continue their tenancy for another year. The defendants failed to pay to the plaintiff the instalment of rent which became due, as claimed, on the 1st of August, 1892, and this action was brought by the plaintiff to recover that sum. These facts are all alleged in the complaint, and the answer admits the execution of the lease, its terms, and the fact that the defendants continued in possession after the expiration of the term. But they denied that they thereby elected to continue the tenancy for another year, which, of course, was nothing more than the denial of a legal conclusion arising upon conceded facts.

The only defense to the action is that Healey, the co-owner with the plaintiff, permitted his firm to remain in possession after the expiration of the year, and it is claimed that he not only had the right to do that, but to continue in possession by virtue of his right as a tenant in common, although it is conceded that he and his firm went into possession only by virtue of the terms and conditions of the lease. It was one of the conditions and covenants of the lease that the parties of the second part—that is, the defendants—would quit and surrender the demised premises at the expiration of the term. The contention on the part of the defendants virtually asserts that, although they went into possession under this lease, they were entitled, in virtue of Healey's co-ownership, to violate this covenant, and thus remain in possession for an indefinite period, against the will of the plaintiff, who owned three fourths of the property. There can be no doubt that, where lands are held by different parties in common as tenants in common, unity of possession and right of possession is a distinguishing feature of those relations. The possession of one tenant in common is the possession of the other. One tenant in common cannot bring an action of trespass against another for entry upon and enjoyment of the common property. The growing crop put in by one tenant in common, who took possession exclusively without contract, goes in severalty as the property of each, on partition made while the crop is growing. The rules of the common law governing the rights of tenants in common are quite well understood. But they have no application to this case. The unity of possession and right of possession which attaches to an estate held in common may, of course, be severed or suspended by agreement of the parties. A deed in fee by one tenant in common to another severs this unity forever. So, too, a lease, which is nothing more than a conveyance of an estate for years, severs or suspends the unity of possession and right of possession, and all relations as co-owners, at least for the time being, and, when such a lease is made, the parties bear to each other all the relations, and are subject to all the obligations, and entitled to all the rights, of landlord and tenant. The lease was made in this case. The two owners in common were the landlords. The tenant was the legal entity or partnership, of which the defendant Healey was a member; and the circumstance that he was such a member did not change the effect of the lease in the slightest particular. Freeman, Cotenancy & Partition, §§ 29-33, 86, 88, 89, 164, 196, 268; 4 Kent, Com. p. 370; O'Hear v. De Goesbriand, 33 Vt. 593. All this is very clear, if we consider the relations of the co-owners to each other and to the property before and after the execution of the lease. Before the lease was executed, either or both were entitled to possession, and neither could lawfully exclude the other. But this situation was completely changed after the lease. Then the plaintiff, although he was the owner of an undivided three fourths of the property, could not enter upon it or enjoy it without becoming a trespasser. His rights were, then, governed solely by the lease. He could demand rent. He could institute summary proceedings under the statute regulating the rights and duties of landlord and tenant. In a word, during the existence of the lease, his peculiar rights as a tenant in common were suspended, and the unity of possession and right of possession had been severed, and, for the time being, abrogated by his own agreement. This was equally true of the defendant and his firm. Although he owned but an undivided one fourth of the property, yet he or his firm was entitled to the exclusive possession as against his co-owner. He could maintain an action of trespass, not only against the other owner, but any stranger, which, of course, he could not do in virtue merely of his co-ownership. In a word, his rights and powers over the property as a tenant in common were suspended during the existence of the lease, and his firm was then in possession as tenant, entitled to all the rights as a tenant, and subject to all the obligations and incidents of that relation. His relations to the plaintiff as a lessee continued until the lease was terminated; and it could not be terminated in any other way, so far as the defendant is concerned, except by fulfilling the covenant of the lease, which was to surrender up possession at the expiration of the term. This the firm refused to do, and, by so refusing, it is said that they have thrown off all their obligations as a lessee under a written lease, and without the plaintiff's consent have assumed the rights of a tenant in common; that is, the right to remain in possession notwithstanding the lease, so long as the tenancy in common continues.

No one can question the rule of law that, where a tenant holds over after the expiration of the term, the law will imply an agreement to hold for another year, and that the landlord is entitled to demand rent accordingly. Haymes v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 287. The defendants in this case continued in possession after the year expired, and unless they had in law the right to remain in possession, in defiance of their covenant to surrender, then there is no defense to the action. They assumed, by the lease, all the obligations of tenants to the landlord, and one of these obligations was to pay the rent stipulated for another year in case they remained in possession after the term expired. I am not able to understand how this obligation is changed by the circumstance that Healey, one of the co-owners, was a member of the firm that took the lease. His right of possession as co-owner was suspended by the lease, and could not revive until all of its covenants were fully performed by the surrender. Healey was not the landlord or the tenant. The owners, as a unit, were the landlords, and the firm, as such, was the tenant. It might just as well be urged that if this lease, instead of running to the firm of which Healey was a member, ran to a corporation in which he was a shareholder, that circumstance would change the legal effect of holding over by the corporation. It is plain that Healey could not, by act or word, change the obligations of the lease as against the plaintiff. It is just as plain that he could not, by act or word, change the legal effect of holding over by his firm, or change the legal character of the act of the firm in continuing the possession, after the term expired. The law declares that this act is an election on the part of the tenant to attorn to the landlord for another year, and entitles the landlord to so regard it. Healey had no more power to change the legal effect of the act than any other member of the firm. He could not be a lessee one day, and a tenant in common the next, as his interest might require. The firm being bound by the lease, he was also, and not until after all of its covenants and conditions had been performed by surrender of the possession could he resume his relations to the property as a tenant in common.

This anticipates the principal defense to the action, which, as disclosed by the record, was a very transparent device that ought not to mislead any court. It appears that on the 20th of April, 1892, just as the year was about to expire, Healey, in his individual name, addressed a letter to his firm in which he consented that the firm might remain in possession after the year expired. Thus the writer, though bound, by the covenants of the lease, to surrender the possession at the end of the year, has, by writing a letter virtually to himself, succeeded, as is claimed, in abrogating the lease and abolishing the relation of landlord and tenant. The letter, when offered in evidence, was excluded by the court under the plaintiff's objection, and to this ruling there was an exception which it is said is ground for reversing the judgment. All that the letter proved was Healey's permission to his firm to remain in possession, and, unless that permission changed the legal character and effect of holding over or continuing in possession, it was utterly immaterial. If he could change the obligations of the lease and the law of landlord and tenant in this respect, he could of course in every other respect. He could, when possession had been obtained under the lease, write a letter to himself, or to his firm, permitting them to occupy the property at a reduced rental, or without any rent at all. The moment that we concede the principle that Healey could do something to change the relations of the parties after the possession under the lease which his partners could not do, the most absurd consequences must follow. The only just and consistent rule in such cases must be that when a tenant in common unites in a lease, as the parties here did, their rights and obligations are governed by that lease while it is in force, and the lease is continued or abrogated in such cases in the same way and by the same acts that leases are continued and abrogated in all cases. The presence of one of the joint owners in the firm to which the demise was made cannot take this case out of the general law of landlord and tenant. The plaintiff, by the lease, surrendered to the firm to which the demise was made as a firm, and not to any individual member thereof, his right to the possession as a tenant in common so long as that lease remained in force. Thus, while he lost the right to the possession, he acquired the right to demand the stipulated rent. The right of his co-owner was affected by the lease in precisely the same way. His individual right to the possession as a tenant in common was suspended for the demised term, and his firm, as such, acquired the right to the exclusive possession. The duration of the lease was fixed by its terms and by the law, and one of the parties could not change it without the consent of all. The legal effect of that instrument was to vest in the firm, as such, the exclusive possession and enjoyment of the premises for one year, in case they were surrendered at the end of that time, but if they were not, and the firm still retained the possession, then for an additional year, at the option of the plaintiff. It was a legal right which the plaintiff acquired by the contract to treat the defendants as tenants for another year when they continued the possession, and Healey could not change or destroy that right any more than the plaintiff could change or nullify any right which the firm acquired by the demise. Healey could no doubt waive his right to his share of the rent, or give it to his firm, if he chose to do so, but he could not relieve the firm from their obligations to pay to the plaintiff his share, either before the year expired, or after, if they remained in possession, and he elected to treat them as tenants. The firm, being a tenant under the lease, could not, through Healey, one of the members, change the terms or obligations of that contract any more than it could if Healey was not a member, or any more than the plaintiff could, to the prejudice of the tenant. The letter of Healey to his firm, or to himself, attempted to do all this. It was an attempt on his part to extend the right of the tenant under the lease to remain in possession without incurring the legal consequences which the law attaches to that act. He had no more power or right to do that than the plaintiff would have to resume possession as tenant in common after receiving a quarter's rent on the second year, and, if the owner of three fourths of the common estate could not change the legal rights of the parties under the lease, it is difficult to see how the owner of one fourth could. What Healey said to his firm and to himself was virtually this: "We will remain in possession after the year notwithstanding our covenant to surrender, and by virtue of my relations to the property as tenant in common I absolve you and myself from all the legal consequences of the act; and, although we have obtained the exclusive possession under a lease, we can now continue to hold it indefinitely, without regard to the lease or its obligations, but as tenants in common." The learned trial court very properly held that proof of such a transparent device to nullify a solemn contract was not admissible.

The only ground of defense presented at the trial was that Healey had at all times, as tenant in common, the right of possession, and that he could, under that right, keep his firm in possession indefinitely. Both sides moved for the direction of a verdict, and neither party asked to have any question presented to the jury. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, thus determining all questions of fact, if any, as well as the questions of law, against the defendants. They are now precluded from raising any questions in this court, except such as arise from undisputed or admitted facts. They must stand or fall upon the proposition urged at the trial, which, in effect, was that although the unity of possession and right of possession were severed by the lease and suspended for the whole period of its duration, yet Healey retained the right to extend the term of the demise at his own will and without the consent of the plaintiff, and could absolve his firm, which was the tenant, from all the legal consequences of holding over. If that proposition is law, then this action was well defended. In my opinion, such a proposition is utterly indefensible, and hence I conclude that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that the judgment below is right. We have no right in this court to draw inferences of fact from the evidence for the purpose of reversing a judgment, though we may in order to sustain it. Nor have we any right to assume that this is a hard case, where the harshness of the law should be tempered by the spirit of equity. There is nothing in the record before us to show that this is a hard case, if that were of any consequence. So far as we know, or can know from the record, the defendants remained in possession of the premises during the whole quarter for which the plaintiff recovered rent, and, if that be so, the judgment compelled them to pay only the agreed rent for the premises which they have possessed and enjoyed. If they have moved out, and the plaintiff has resumed possession or relet the premises, their obligation to pay rent has ceased, since the plaintiff could not recover double rent. If they have moved out and left the premises vacant and unrented, it is their own fault, since, if Healey could, while they were in possession under the lease, extend the right of possession, he certainly could, after moving out, sublet or relet the premises. In any aspect in which the case is viewed, no reason can be found for disturbing the judgment, and it should therefore be affirmed.

It may be proper, before closing, to notice the grounds upon which the prevailing opinion rests. It is based upon two inferences,—one of fact and the other of law: (1) That since the plaintiff's signature does not appear from the printed copy of the lease contained in the record to be attached, and that of both Healey and his firm do so appear, then it may be that Healey executed the lease for the plaintiff as his agent; and (2) being agent for the plaintiff to make the lease, he had authority also, as agent for the plaintiff, to bind him by giving his firm permission to remain in possession after the year expired. The inference of agency or actual authority from the plaintiff is based solely upon the absence of his signature from the copy of the lease as printed in the record, which may be due to a blunder of the printer or scrivener. This inference of fact is made, not only against the findings of the trial court that no such authority in fact or in law was possessed by Healey, but against the admission of the pleadings that both of the common owners united in making the lease; and that, too, not for the purpose of sustaining the judgment, but of reversing it. If the lease had not been printed in the record at all, the plaintiff's case would stand admitted upon the record, as it does now. It is hardly necessary to add that a fact admitted by the pleadings cannot be contradicted or qualified by equivocal inferences from the proofs in any case, and much less is it permissible in this court, for the purpose of reversing a judgment based not only upon the admission, but upon the findings of the trial court which negative the existence of such fact. The proposition of law that an agent, to execute a lease for a definite term, has power to bind his principal by a renewal or extension of the time, will, I venture to say, be found equally difficult to maintain.

It may finally be observed that the circumstance that the plaintiff's signature does not appear upon the copy of the lease in the record has not the slightest significance, and is not even referred to in the defendants' brief, and was not mentioned at the argument. We might as well, upon the same reasoning, reverse a judgment upon a promissory note appearing in the record without signature, when the execution and delivery were admitted by the pleadings.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William Samuel Johnson, for appellant:

The poles of the defendant electric company, since they are necessary to the lighting of the public highway, are lawfully placed in the street in front of plaintiff's land, and cannot be ejected therefrom.

An electric-light pole can be placed in the public streets of an incorporated village without consent of or compensation to the owner of the fee of the street, where the pole is used to effect the purpose of lighting the public street.

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in ejectment to compel the defendant to remove its poles and wires from Palmer avenue, in front of the plaintiff's premises. The plaintiff is the owner of lands at the corner of Palmer and Rushmore avenues, in the town of Mamaroneck, Westchester county, and his fee extends to the center of the highways, subject to the easements of the public therein. The defendant is an electric corporation, organized under the transportation corporations law of this state, having for its objects the manufacture and use of electricity, for producing light, heat, or power, and in lighting streets, avenues, public parks and places, and public and private buildings of cities, villages, and towns within this state. On the 14th day of March, 1894, it obtained a grant from the town board of the town of Mamaroneck, giving it the right to construct and maintain suitable lines of wire for the purpose of conducting electricity to such points within the corporate limits of the town as may seem fit to the company, subject, however, to certain rules and restrictions specifically mentioned, among which were the requirements that the wires should be insulated, conducted upon poles of a specified size and uniformity, made straight and attractive in appearance, on which wires should be strung not less than 18 feet from the ground. The grant contained the further condition that the company shall furnish to the town $100 worth of light, free of charge, each and every year, and for every $1,000 worth of light bought by the town from the company an additional $100 worth of free light shall be furnished, the lights to be placed in such locations as shall be designated by the town board. Pursuant to this grant, the town contracted for certain lights at the rate of $22.50 per light per year; and thereupon, pursuant to the grant and contract, the defendant constructed its line of wire through Rushmore and Palmer avenues, locating a light on the corner of those avenues in front of plaintiff's premises, and erected on Palmer avenue, in front of his premises, two poles, on which the wires were strung, and which the evidence shows were necessary to enable the company to perform its contract with the town. This action was prosecuted to recover the possession of the lands occupied by these poles, and for damages.

The care, management, and control of the public ways devolve upon the local municipal government in which they are located; and it is the duty of the local government to maintain them in such condition that the public, by the exercise of due care, may pass over them in safety. In the darkness of the night, in crowded thoroughfares, light is an important aid, largely tending to promote the convenience, as well as the safety, of the traveling public. It is not only one of the uses to which the public ways may be devoted, but, in the case of crowded thoroughfares, a duty devolves upon the municipality of supplying it. In such cases it is one of the burdens upon the fee which must be borne as an incident to the public right of traveling over the way, and is deemed one of the uses for which the land was taken as a public highway. Johnson v. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. 54 Hun, 469; Consumers' Gas & Electric Light Co. v. Congress Spring Co. 61 Hun, 133; Witcher v. Holland Waterworks Co. 66 Hun, 619, Affirmed 142 N. Y. 626; Hequembourg v. Dunkirk, 49 Hun, 550; Sun Printing & Pub. Asso. v. New York, 152 N. Y. 257, 265, 37 L. R. A. 788; Van Brunt v. Flatbush, 128 N. Y. 50, 56.

As we understand the opinion of the learned court below, its views are in accord with our own as applied to public highways in cities and incorporated villages; but it reached the conclusion that the rule was different with reference to country highways, and that the density of population ought not to be made the test in determining the line in respect to easements which separate the urban from the rural districts. 6 App. Div. 12. That court was also of the opinion that this case was controlled by the case of Eels v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 143 N. Y. 133, 25 L. R. A. 640. Our views are somewhat different. We think the Eels Case is clearly distinguishable from that under consideration. In that case ejectment was brought to remove the poles of a telegraph and telephone company which were not used in any sense for a street purpose. It is urged that the wires might be used for the purpose of notifying the fire department of a municipality of the breaking out of a fire. Undoubtedly, and so far as they are used for that purpose, it clearly would be for a municipal purpose; but there is a broad distinction between a municipal purpose and a street purpose. The primary object of highways is for the public travel by persons and animals, and by carriages or vehicles used for the transportation of persons and goods, other than by railroads. Sewers drain the surface water from the highways, and thus relieve them from impairment and destruction. In this respect sewers are for a street purpose. In addition, they may drain also the abutting property and houses, and thus tend to promote the public health. In this respect they are for a municipal purpose. Water supplied by mains through the highways may be used for cleansing and sprinkling the streets. In this respect it is for a street purpose. It may be used by the abutting owners for cleansing and for domestic purposes, and is also used for the extinguishment of fires. In this respect it is for a municipal purpose. Light is, as we have seen, an aid to the public in the night-time in traveling upon the highway. It is therefore used for a street purpose. All of the street purposes which we have referred to are clearly incident to the highway, and are deemed within the grant of lands for highway purposes whenever the necessity for these uses arises. Not so with telegraph and telephone wires. They in no way preserve or improve the streets, or aid the public in traveling over them.

We are thus brought to a consideration of the difference between urban and rural streets. That there is a distinction between such streets has long been recognized by the authorities; but a careful examination of the cases discloses the fact that the distinction arises out of the necessary requirements of the public in the use made of them. Dillon, in his work upon Municipal Corporations (vol. 2, § 688), says: In "the author's judgment, the uses to which streets in towns and cities may legitimately be put are greater and more numerous than with respect to ordinary roads or highways in the country. With reference to the latter all the public requires is the easement of passage and its incidents; . . . but, with respect to streets in populous places, the public convenience requires more than a mere right to pass over and upon them. They may need to be graded and brought to a level, and therefore the public or municipal authorities may not only change the surface, but cut down trees, dig up the earth, and may use it in improving the street or elsewhere, and may make culverts, drains, and sewers upon or under the surface." This same distinction was made in Bloomfield & R. Natural Gaslight Co. v. Calkins, 62 N. Y. 386, in which it was held that a gaslight company could not lay its pipes in a country highway without compensation to the owner of the abutting land, where its pipes were not used for the lighting of the highway through which the company sought to lay its pipes. But the owner of the fee in a country highway, taken, opened, and dedicated for a public use, is entitled to no further compensation after the territory has become thickly settled and the highway has become a street of an incorporated city. This was recognized in the Eels Case, and it is therefore apparent that, at the time the land was taken for a highway, it was impliedly dedicated to the uses which the public might in the future require. Light may not be necessary in an ordinary country highway, and yet there may be country roads in which the travel is so great as to make light a necessity in order to avoid collisions and injuries in the night-time. The inhabitants of our large cities are in a measure supplied with food and other necessities of life from the surrounding country. Scarcely a city can be named in which there will not be found one or more great public highways leading into the country, which, day and night, are thronged with teams transporting the produce of the farm to the markets of the city. Towns, in some instances, have recognized the public necessity, and have caused some of these thoroughfares to be lighted. In many of our towns there are villages of considerable size remaining unincorporated, in which lights in the street would be of great convenience, and materially add to the safety of the public. May not towns properly supply these streets and thronged highways with light? If they may, they may properly contract with others to supply the light. The court below appears to have feared trouble with reference to the determination of the question of the necessity for light by the courts, and thought that each case would have to be determined on its own facts, and that the decision in each would vary with the varying minds and judgments of the courts and petit jurors; but we apprehend no difficulty in this regard. We think that question should be left to the determination of the parties specified by the statute. Indeed, it appears to us that the question under discussion is entirely controlled by the statute. The statute not only authorizes the incorporation of companies for supplying gas for the lighting of streets in cities, towns, and villages, but it also authorizes the incorporation of companies for the manufacturing and supplying of electricity for lighting streets, avenues, public parks, and places in cities, villages, and towns. It then provides that such corporations using electricity for light, heat, or power, may carry on the business of lighting "by electricity or using it for heat or power in cities, towns, and villages within this state, and the streets, avenues, public parks, and places thereof, and public and private buildings therein; and for the purposes of such business to generate and supply electricity, . . . and to lay, erect, and construct suitable wires or other conductors, with the necessary poles, pipes, or other fixtures in, on, over, and under the streets, avenues, public parks, and places of such cities, towns, or villages, for conducting and distributing electricity, with the consent of the municipal authorities thereof, and in such manner and under such reasonable regulations as they may prescribe." Transportation Corporations Law, §§ 60, 61. The town law provides that a town is a municipal corporation, comprising the inhabitants within its boundaries. § 2.

It will be observed that no distinction is made by the statute between cities, towns, and villages; that a corporation organized under the provisions of the act may, with the consent of the municipal authorities, under such reasonable regulations as they may prescribe, construct suitable wires or other conductors with the necessary poles, pipes, or other fixtures in, on, over, and under the streets, etc., of a town, as well as that of the city or an incorporated village. Who can better determine the necessity for light in a highway than the inhabitants of the town through which it runs? Shall the courts assume the prerogative of saying that a town shall or shall not have light, when the statute provides that its municipal authorities shall determine the question? No citizen of the town is here complaining with reference to the action of the municipal authorities of the town of Mamaroneck in contracting with the defendant for light. If these town officers have exceeded their authority, and wasted the public moneys, the courts are open to correct the abuse and prevent the waste in a suit by a taxpayer; but no such person is here complaining of the action of the town authorities. The plaintiff is not complaining of the contract or of the supplying of his premises with light. He is seeking compensation for the ground occupied by the poles of the company in the highway in front of his premises. The authorities of his town having determined the necessity for the lights and contracted with the defendant to furnish it, and the light being for a street purpose, we think no burden is placed upon the fee that was not within the implied contemplation of the parties at the time the land was taken and dedicated to highway purposes.

Our conclusion is supported by authority. In the case of Van Brunt v. Flatbush, 128 N. Y. 50, Earl, J., refers to the question we have had under consideration in discussing the right to construct a sewer in the town of Flatlands. He says: "If the legislature had authorized a system of sewerage in the town of Flatlands, for the convenience, health, and welfare of the inhabitants of that town, and this sewer had been projected with lateral sewers, with the privilege of the owners of adjacent lots to connect their lots therewith, then we are inclined to believe, for reasons we need not now state, that the character of the avenue and of the locality was such, and the population is such, that the sewer could be built in the avenue without the consent of the fee owners, and without compensation to them." In the case under consideration, as we have seen, the legislature has authorized the municipal authorities of the town to contract for the providing of light for street purposes. Again, in the case of Witcher v. Holland Waterworks Co. 66 Hun, 619, an action was brought by an abutting owner to recover the possession of lands in a public highway, occupied by the defendant with water pipes and a hydrant. The village of Holland was unincorporated. A water pipe had been laid through the highway, and hydrants had been established, from which the water might be taken for street purposes. It was held in the general term that there was a public necessity for the water, and that, it being for street purposes, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and that conclusion was affirmed in this court. 142 N. Y. 626. And in the case of People, Woodhaven Gaslight Co., v. Deehan, 153 N. Y. 528, we held that a grant by the authorities of a town to a gaslight company to lay conductors for conducting gas through the public highways of the town was valid.

There is no question of public policy that is adverse to our contention. It may be that the owners of the fee in highways should not be burdened with sewers, conductors, or wires in which they have no interest or right to use, but which are intended for the use of other localities; but sewers, conductors, and lighting wires intended for the use, benefit, and improvement of the highway through which they pass, and of the abutting owners thereon, which promote the comfort and safety of the traveling public, stand upon a different footing, and impose no burden upon the fee not intended by the grant for highway purposes. It may be that some prejudice exists against wires strung on unsightly poles; but the statute empowers the citizens of the locality, through their duly constituted authorities, to determine the manner and the regulations in and under which the wires should be constructed. They may specify, as was done in this case, the character of poles that shall be used, or they may require that the wires shall be placed in conduits under ground. The whole matter is left to their judgment and discretion. If the people of a town want light in their highways, and are willing to pay for it, no reason is apparent, founded upon public policy, morals, or law, why the courts should interfere to prevent it. If the highway be but a country road, lightly traveled, and no necessity exists for light, then a taxpayer has a right to object; but, until such objection is made, we think it may fairly be assumed that the necessity for the light exists. The statute has given to the authorities of a town the power to determine whether they will have light. The question of necessity must, in the first instance, be determined by such authorities, and in this case no person is in court seeking to review the determination made by the authorities of the town of Mamaroneck in contracting with the defendant.

One who puts a witness on the stand, but excuses him without asking him any questions that are material to the issues on trial, is not thereby precluded, if the witness is afterwards called and examined by the opposite party, from cross-examining him and discrediting him by proving his contradictory statements out of court.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of a General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Yates County Circuit in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of services rendered in storing apples. Affirmed.

Defendant placed some apples in plaintiff's cold storage building at Penn Yan. When they were taken out in the spring they were found to be in bad condition, having been frost bitten and being damp and rotten. Defendant claimed that when they were placed in the cold storage they were of very superior quality and in fine condition, having been carefully picked, selected, and packed. Plaintiff claimed that the apples were of inferior quality when placed in the cold storage, and that their bad condition in the spring was due to defects in the apples, and not to want of proper care.

The material points in the case sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Harris & Harris, for appellant:

Wilson was the defendant's witness, and remained so all through the case. The defendant produced and swore him, thus vouching for his trustworthiness. He was not a hostile witness, nor one whom the defendant was obliged to call, but he was put on the stand by the defendant voluntarily.

A party cannot show inconsistent statements made by his own witness for the purpose of impeaching him.

In England and in some of the states this rule has been abrogated or modified by statute.

But in New York the rule is firmly fixed. Sisson v. Conger, 1 Thomp. & C. 564; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 442.

Even where a plaintiff was under the necessity of calling the defendant in interest as a witness, for the sake of formal proof only, he not being party to the record, it has been held that he was thereby made a witness for all purposes, and might be cross-examined to the whole case.

Mr. C. W. Kimball, for respondent:

The rule prohibiting a party from impeaching his own witness was not violated by permitting the witness Wilson to be contradicted.

Beebe v. Tinker, 2 Root, 160.

Parker, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant called as a witness one Wilson, who, after being sworn, testified as follows: "I reside in Penn Yan. I know the defendant. I did not work for him in the spring of 1893; I was at the cold storage at that time about ten minutes, in the fore part of April." No other questions were asked him, nor did he give any further testimony, and the testimony quoted had no bearing whatever upon the issues on trial. It is suggested that he was called under a misapprehension; but, be that as it may, we shall assume merely, in passing on the question growing out of his being called and sworn, that, before any material question was asked, the party calling the witness excused him from the witness stand. When the plaintiff came to present evidence in rebuttal of the testimony adduced on the part of the defendant, it called Wilson to the stand, and he gave material testimony in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant, claiming the right to cross-examine him, asked him whether he had not, at specified times and places, made to other persons statements tending to contradict the testimony given by him upon the plaintiff's examination. Wilson denied having made them, and the defendant afterwards called witnesses who testified that Wilson had made the contradictory statements that he specifically denied having made. To this evidence the plaintiff objected, upon the ground that it was incompetent, in that the defendant, having first sworn and examined Wilson as a witness in his own behalf, could not be allowed to discredit him by giving testimony that he had made statements out of court differing from his statements as a witness in court. The exception to the ruling of the court admitting the evidence notwithstanding the objection presents one of the questions which, on this review, it is urged, call for a reversal of the judgment. Upon a motion for a new trial, this question was very carefully considered by Mr. Justice Rumsey, who reached the conclusion that no error had been committed, and the general term has affirmed the position thus taken. As the question is a novel one, we shall briefly state the reasons that persuade us that the view taken by the learned court was the correct one.

The rule is well settled in this state that a party cannot show inconsistent statements made by his own witness for the purpose of impeaching him. Coulter v. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. 56 N. Y. 585; Nichols v. White, 85 N. Y. 531; Hankinson v. Vantine, 152 N. Y. 20, 27. This rule, which was originally established by authority, came to us from England, where, as in some of our sister states, it has since been either abrogated or modified by statute. Stephen, Digest of Ev. Chase's ed. p. 329, note; Selover v. Bryant, 21 L. R. A. 418, note (54 Minn. 434); 11 Am. L. Rev. p. 261. Greenleaf on Evidence (vol. 1, § 442) states the reason for the rule as follows: "When a party offers a witness in proof of his cause, he thereby, in general, represents him as worthy of belief. He is presumed to know the character of the witnesses he adduces; and having thus presented them to the court, the law will not permit the party afterwards to impeach their general reputation for truth, or to impugn their credibility by general evidence, tending to show them to be unworthy of belief, for this would enable him to destroy the witness if he spoke against him, and to make him a good witness if he spoke for him, with the means in his hand of destroying his credit if he spoke against him." See also Wharton, Ev. § 549. The rule being established beyond change, save by legislative enactment, that one cannot impeach his own witness, the question presented here is whether Wilson became the defendant's witness, within the meaning of the rule. Would he have become such had his name been simply called without administering the oath? If not, would he have become such through the additional act of administering the oath? If the propounding of questions be also necessary, would an inquiry as to his name and residence have made him the party's witness in such a sense that he would be bound to support his character from the beginning to the end of the trial, or would that have happened only upon some question being asked him material to the issues on trial?

It often happens that a witness is intentionally but unadvisedly called. the counsel for the moment laboring under the impression that the witness has knowledge of some fact it is desirable to establish; but, before his examination has proceeded far enough to bring about an inquiry touching any material fact to the controversy, counsel is advised by an associate, or by the party, that the wrong witness has been called, and that some other person is possessed of the information he desires to have given to the court. In such a case it would clearly seem to be a hardship that an error thus committed, which quite frequently happens in the press of trial, should burden a party with the responsibility of having the person called treated as a witness for that purpose throughout the trial.

So far as the diligence of the counsel and our examination have disclosed, this precise question has not been before the court of last resort in any of the states except Connecticut where many years ago, in the case of Beebe v. Tinker, 2 Root, 166, a witness was called and sworn. As to the point regarding which the plaintiff had called him to testify, the court ruled that it was not relevant to the issue; and thereupon the defendant took the witness, and asked him several questions, the answers made by him being against the plaintiff. Thereupon the plaintiff offered to introduce witnesses to impeach, which was objected to on the ground that he was the plaintiff's witness. The report of the case concludes with: "The court admitted the witnesses to impeach his character, on the ground that, although the plaintiff introduced him, yet, as the defendant only improved him, in that respect he was to be considered as the defendant's witness." In England where the rule originated, the tendency of the courts seems to have been not to apply it unless the party has proceeded so far with the witness as to ask him some question bearing upon the issues on trial. In Creedy v. Carr, 7 Car. & P. 64, a witness was called for the defendant, and asked, "Are you the landlord of the house at which the fire occurred?" The witness an-answered, "I am, sir." Thereupon the court asked the defendant's counsel, "What do you propose to prove more?" and he replied, "My lord, I will close my case here." The counsel for the plaintiff said, "I wish to cross-examine the landlord;" and the court said, "Oh, no; I stopped his evidence." Counsel: "He was asked a question, and he answered it, and I have therefore a right to cross-examine him." The court: "Not where the witness, as here, has been only asked an immaterial question, and his evidence is stopped by the judge." In Wood v. MacKinsien, 2 Moody & R. 273, a witness was called for the plaintiff and sworn in the usual way; but, before he had put any questions to the witness, counsel stated that he had been misinstructed as to what the witness was able to prove, and he should not examine him at all. The witness being about to retire, counsel for the defendant claimed the right to cross-examine him, but the court said: "Here the learned counsel explains that there has been a mistake, which consists in this, that the witness is found not to be able to speak at all as to the transaction which was supposed to be within his knowledge. This is, I think, such a mistake as entitles the party calling the witness to withdraw him without his being subject to cross-examination." In Bracegirdle v. Bailey, 1 Fost. & F. 536, the plaintiff was sworn and tendered as a witness for cross-examination, but was not examined in chief. The defendant's counsel asked several questions touching his conduct and life; but the court ruled that these questions could not be asked, inasmuch as he has proved nothing that you could cross-examine him on to discredit him. In Rush v. Smith, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 94, it was held that a witness called to produce documents, and sworn by mistake, and a question put to him that he does not answer, does not entitle the opposite party to cross-examine him.

The general view upon which these cases proceeded is that a party does not necessarily make a person his witness by merely calling and swearing him; and we are not able to discover any good reason for disagreeing with them. On the contrary, it seems to us that the rule is not properly applicable save in cases where a party attempts to elicit, from a witness called to the stand, testimony material to the issues upon trial; that, until such an attempt is made, the party has done nothing that can by any possibility affect the trial, either to his own benefit or to the harm of his opponent, and therefore he has not offered a witness in proof of his cause, and is not within the reason of the rule that burdens him with the necessity of supporting the character of the witness to the end of the trial. His mistake, however caused, has not harmed the other party, and the interests of justice can in no wise be promoted by permitting that other party to take such advantage of the mistake as will fasten upon his opponent the responsibility of vouching for the character of a witness actually hostile, and from whom he has not attempted to secure any proof in the cause.

The learned counsel for the appellant urges that his exception taken to that portion of the charge in which the court stated "that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover if the plant was not properly run" calls for a reversal of the judgment. The defendant admitted the making of the contract upon which the plaintiff sued, but alleged that the contract had not been properly performed by the plaintiff, and sought to recover his damages. In the charge to the jury the court did say that the plaintiff could not recover for the services, unless it convinced the jury by a fair preponderance of evidence that it did keep the apples in proper cold storage, etc. But as we read the exception, it was not intended to have, nor is it likely it had, the effect of calling the attention of the court to the fact that the counsel for the plaintiff claimed that there was error in the charge as to the burden of proof. The language of the exception apparently related solely to another portion of the charge, in which the court said that, if the jury should find "that the rotting was the result of the plant having been improperly run, it follows that the plaintiff has not performed its contract. It also follows that whatever damage has been thus caused to the defendant he should be compensated for in this action." This portion of the charge was not error, and the exception to which our attention is called pointed to this, and to no other, part of the charge.

The judgment should be affirmed with costs.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Onondaga County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the contract price for constructing sewer work for the defendant city. Reversed.

Statement by Parker, Ch. J.:

The plaintiff, the survivor of his deceased partner, Charles Utting, brought this action to recover a balance that he alleged was due upon a contract entered into between the firm of Weston & Utting and the city of Syracuse for the construction of what is generally known as the "Kennedy Street Sewer." The contract was executed in November, 1889, and shortly thereafter Weston & Utting commenced the construction of the sewer; and, during the few months following, the work so far progressed that 1,453 feet of the sewer was constructed. Then a change in the city government took place, which resulted in a change of city engineers; and the new engineer, after some investigation, reported to the common council that the sewer was not being constructed in accordance with the contract. Thereupon the common council availed itself of the clause in the contract providing for such a contingency, and suspended the work upon the claim that the contractors were not performing the work as per agreement. The common council then, by an appropriate committee, assisted by the engineer, commenced an investigation of the sewer so far as completed, and of the manner of its construction. The sewer was visited by this committee, and some of its members, in company with the deputy city engineer, passed through the sewer, and thereafter reported the result of their investigation to the common council.

On the 29th day of July, 1890, the common council, having received the report, passed the following resolution: "Resolved, that the contractors, Weston & Utting, having the contract for building the Kennedy street sewer, be required to complete the part of the sewer already built in accordance with the terms of the contract, except that the contractors need not be required to change the grade of the work as it now exists, and that the invert portion shall remain as now laid. And the contract for said work is hereby amended and modified to that extent, the remaining portion of said sewer to be constructed in accordance with the terms of said contract without modification." After the passage of the resolution, and before its approval by the mayor, the contractors entered into another contract, by which they agreed, in addition to fulfilling the obligations imposed upon them by the resolution, to correct, if required, all sags that might exist in the bottom of the sewer. Pursuant to that resolution, the contractors went on and completed the balance of the sewer in accordance with the terms of the contract, as is conceded on all sides. In the meantime, resolutions were passed by the common council extending the time for the completion of the work under the contract, no objection thereto being offered by any of the members of the common council. October 20, 1890, a partial estimate was submitted to the common council by the city engineer for work done on the sewer, amounting to $3,141.50; and the common council, by a unanimous vote of all the members responding to the call of the roll, directed that a warrant be drawn for such amount. This was done, the mayor's signature attached, and the warrant paid. From time to time thereafter, down to January 5, 1892, other partial estimates for work done on the sewer were submitted to the common council, aggregating over $13,000, and such amounts were always paid by like direction of the common council. July 25, 1892, the commissioner of public works, through the city engineer, made and submitted to the common council a final estimate and account of the work done by the contractors, covering the whole distance of the sewer, and including extra work to the amount of $803.19, incurred in connecting the sewer with Oakwood Cemetery, which, after crediting payments already made, showed a balance due to the contractors of $9,433.41. The estimate was headed "Final Account. City Engineer to John Weston and Charles Utting, Dr." Among other things, it contained the following certificate: "I hereby certify that, for the distance of 1,453 feet from Onondaga creek, the work was done in accordance with the resolution adopted by the common council the 29th of July, 1890. The next 1,000 feet were done in accordance with the contract and specifications, except in the matter of grade. At the beginning of the north end, the sewer is about 2 feet above the grade established by the original map, and at the end of 1,000 feet it is at said grade. The remaining portion of the sewer was completed in accordance with the contract and specifications." Subsequently, the common council passed a resolution directing that payment be made in accordance with the estimate, but the resolution was vetoed by the mayor; and thereafter, and on December 12, 1892, the common council passed a resolution affecting the 1,453 feet of the sewer first constructed, in which resolution it was recited that notice had been given to the contractors to take the necessary steps within three days to put their work in a condition to fulfil the terms of their contract, but that, notwithstanding such notice, the contractors did not, within the said three days, nor at all, take such measures as, in the opinion of the city engineer, were necessary to insure the satisfactory completion of said work, and it was "resolved, that said contract be, and the same is hereby, declared abandoned by said contractors, said Weston & Utting; and further resolved, that the commissioner of public works forthwith notify such contractors to discontinue all work under said contract." The city authorities having refused to accept the contract as completed, but, on the contrary, having formally declared it not completed, and the contract abandoned by the contractors, and having refused to take any steps whatever under it to make an assessment upon the property benefited, in order to raise the money with which to pay the expenses of constructing the sewer as provided by the contract, the plaintiff brought this action. He claims that, notwithstanding it was provided in the contract that no payment should be made until the cost was assessed upon and collected from the assessable taxpayers liable for local taxation for the construction of sewers, the defendant has been guilty of a breach of contract, and therefore he is entitled to recover the damages caused to him by their failure to make performance. Upon the trial it was insisted by the defendant, and testimony was offered tending to prove, that the contractors failed to comply with the contract in other respects than those mentioned in the resolution of July 29; and it is made to appear that after the passage of the resolutions declaring that the contractors, Weston & Utting, had abandoned the contract, the authorities had caused a portion of the sewer to be rebuilt. Evidence tending to show faulty construction was given. On the other hand, testimony was presented tending to support the contention of the plaintiff that all the variations from the contract were made with the knowledge of the city engineer in charge of the work, and done with his approval and by his direction; and it was insisted that such approval and direction were founded upon actual necessity in some respects, and good judgment in others. The court decided that, as to the variations in the construction of the sewer referred to in the resolution of July 29, the common council had waived strict performance, and modified the contract to that extent, and that they had also waived such defects as had come to the knowledge of the common council before passing this resolution, although the defects were not mentioned therein; and he submitted to the jury the question whether, in all other respects, there was a substantial performance of the contract by the contractors, and the verdict in favor of the plaintiff constituted an affirmative answer to that question. The judgment entered thereon was affirmed at the general term.

Other facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Charles E. Ide, for appellant:

The attempted modification of the contract by the common council was unauthorized, and their act in that regard ultra vires; and furnished no excuse for the non-performance of the contract according to the plans and specifications.

The contract in question was for a local improvement petitioned for by the property owners, the cost of which was to be raised by local assessment. The work could be let only after competition and bids must be received and the contract awarded on the plans and specifications exhibited at the letting.

The property owners have the right to insist that the work thus petitioned for shall be made to comply with the plans and specifications shown at the letting.

The contract provided for changes and how they could be made by the engineer, namely, by his express sanction in writing. That course was not followed.

This was in direct violation of the contract, and such directions by the engineers, if given, could furnish no ground for a non-compliance with the contract by the contractor.

A compromise can be made although the claim compromised is ultra vires.

1 Beach, Pub. Corp. §§ 638-694.

After the defendant, having permitted the contractor to proceed with the work after the passage of the resolution of July 29, to complete nearly four fifths of the sewer at an expense of about $16,000; to do extra work to the amount of $803.19 in connecting sewer with Oakwood Cemetery; and then go back, point up and take up, and relay some 40 feet of the first portion of the sewer, and the city to derive the benefit of the work, the defendant is estopped from raising the question of power in the common council to pass the resolution of July 29.

State Bd. of Agri. v. Citizens Street R. Co. 47 Ind. 407, 17 Am. Rep. 702; East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gaslight Co. 98 Ill. 415, 38 Am. Rep. 97; Turner v. Cruzen, 70 Iowa, 202; Re Jones, 10 Ops. Atty. Gen. 406; Hasbrouck v. Milwaukee, 21 Wis. 217.

The evidence is full and undisputed that the sewer was constructed by the plaintiff in respect to all its details under the supervision of, and in exact accordance with the directions of, the defendant, through its inspector and city engineer.

This, together with the certificate of the city engineer, is conclusive upon the city, and the defendant is estopped from setting up the defense of nonperformance.

There can be no force in the objection that the resolution of July 29, 1890, was procured by bribery, and the offers of the defendant to give evidence of bribery were properly denied.

Where a contract is secured of a municipal corporation by bribery, it is not necessary that it should ratify the contract; having entered upon its performance, it cannot escape liability for the work done or breach subsequently committed, in the absence of proof that the contract was disaffirmed by it upon the discovery of the fraud.

Parker, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On this review it must be taken as established by the verdict of the jury that the plaintiffs substantially performed their contract with the defendant, except as to the construction of the first 1,453 feet of the sewer, the work upon which was done prior to the investigation by the common council. That investigation resulted in a resolution waiving performance so far as the work done was not in conformity with the plans and specifications, and modifying the contract to the extent that it should be in conformity with the work already done. The trial court decided that the resolution of July 29, 1890, effected that result. The appellant concedes that such was the purpose of the common council, but nevertheless insists that it was beyond the power of that body to waive performance of any of the requirements of the contract or specifications, and that in holding otherwise error was committed. The result of our examination of the charter of the city of Syracuse leads us to the conclusion that it does not place any limitations upon the powers of the common council in respect to such acts as the common council undertook to perform by means of the resolution in question. Aside from certain limitations that we need not specify, all details are left to the common council, and not made the basis of the consent of the property owners. The modification attempted, therefore, was within the power of the common council, under the ruling of this court in Meech v. Buffalo, 29 N. Y. 198, Moore v. Albany, 98 N. Y. 396, and Voght v. Buffalo, 133 N. Y. 463.

The appellant next contends that the failure to obtain the certificate of the engineer entitled the defendant to a dismissal of the complaint. We think the certificate obtained was in compliance with the contract as modified by the resolution of July 29, 1890. The engineer could not certify that the work was performed in accordance with the original contract and specifications, because such was not the fact; but he did certify in effect that the work done after the 29th day of July, 1890, was in accordance with the contract and specifications, while the work done prior to that date was in conformity with the resolution adopted by the common council, by which an attempt was made to modify the contract. It was, in effect, therefore, a certificate that the work had been performed in accordance with the original contract as modified by the resolution of July 29, 1890, and was sufficient.

The appellant also insists that the action was prematurely brought, because no part of the contract price has been assessed or collected. The contract provides: "No payment shall be made to the party of the first part under this contract until the cost of such work shall have been ascertained and assessed upon and collected from the taxpayers liable to local taxation for the same; . . . and, as soon thereafter as the cost of said work shall have been collected from said taxpayers, the party of the first part shall be entitled to receive the amount due on said final account. . . ." This clause in the contract is not an unusual one, nor is it, or at least an equivalent provision, a stranger to the courts. As long ago as the action of Hunt v. Utica, 18 N. Y. 442, the court had under consideration a contract of this character. After its completion, and on the 16th day of November, the claim for compensation was allowed by the common council, "payable when collected by assessment." On the 7th of December following, the common council made the necessary assessment, and directed that measures be taken for the collection thereof. On January 26th the assignee of the contractor commenced an action to recover the contract price. At that time no part of the assessment had been paid, but five days later the treasurer issued a warrant for its collection, which was in the hands of the collector at the time of the commencement of the action. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover. The decision of the court in that case has not been questioned in any subsequent case, and the decision of many succeeding cases has been governed by the principle enunciated in that case, viz., that where a way of payment is prescribed by statute or by contract that way must be strictly pursued. People, Ready, v. Syracuse, 144 N. Y. 63; Swift v. New York, 83 N. Y. 528, 533; Howell v. Buffalo, 15 N. Y. 512, 519; Baldwin v. Oswego, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 62, 68; Beard v. Brooklyn, 31 Barb. 142, 149; Dannat v. New York, 66 N. Y. 585.

Such a provision as to work of this character is usual and reasonable; for, as the municipal authorities have no right to make such improvements at the expense of the taxpayers generally, it follows—First, that no money is raised by general taxation that is available for the payment of such expenses; and, second, that it is necessary to make the avails of the special assessment meet the obligations of the city under the contract. All this is known to the contractor when he makes his bid and enters into the contract, and presumably he has provided suitable compensation to himself for the loss of the use of the sums due under his contract until a reasonable time shall have elapsed in which to levy the assessment and make collection. If he finds, as in the case of People, Ready, v. Syracuse, 144 N. Y. 63, that the city has not proceeded with reasonable diligence to collect the assessment, and turn over the proceeds to him, he may and should proceed by mandamus to compel such action on its part. But where a municipality disables itself from performing the contract by such action on its part as makes void, and therefore uncollectible, an assessment, for the purpose of providing compensation, or refuses to perform the contract on its part, as in Reilly v. Albany, 112 N. Y. 30, then an action against the city for the damages sustained by reason of its failure to perform the contract on its part may be maintained. It has been suggested that the two cases last referred to are in conflict, but they are not. The Ready Case points out that, prior to the breach of the contract by the municipality, the contractor's remedy is to apply for a mandamus to hasten municipal action in the absence of due diligence; while the Reilly Case, with equal clearness, marks out the path to be pursued by the contractor, where the other party, to wit, the municipality, either designedly or accidentally puts itself in a position where it will not or cannot perform the contract on its part. In such a case the remedy is against the city for breach of the contract. As we must regard the facts as found by the verdict of the jury, this case comes under the rule in Reilly's Case, for the plaintiffs have fully performed the contract as modified by the resolution of July 29, 1890, and are entitled to compensation therefor. But the defendant, instead of recognizing the plaintiffs' rights in the premises, and proceeding with reasonable diligence to levy the assessment, collect, and turn it over to the plaintiffs, has declared by resolution that the contractors have not only not performed, but have abandoned, the contract, has let to other contractors the rebuilding of a portion of the sewer constructed by these plaintiffs, and has refused to take any steps looking to the making of an assessment upon the property benefited for the purpose of raising the money with which to pay the plaintiffs, as provided by the contract. The plaintiffs' right, therefore, to pursue the defendant for a breach of the contract, is established.

We are thus brought to the last, but not the least, of the interesting questions presented by the applicant, which is that the court ought to have permitted the defendant to prove that the passage of the resolution of July 29, 1890, was corruptly procured. The importance of this question in this particular case is readily apparent. It is not pretended that the contract was substantially performed as to the construction of the first 1,453 feet of the sewer. The certificate of the engineer, which the contract says must be given in order to entitle the plaintiffs to the compensation provided for by the contract, does not assert that, as to the portion of the sewer above referred to, the contract was performed. On the contrary, the certificate is to the effect that performance in that respect is in accordance with the contract as modified by the resolution of July 29, 1890. If that resolution be void and of no effect, then the plaintiffs have not established their right to recover in this action; for they have not only failed to prove the making of the necessary certificate by the engineer, but they have failed to prove substantial performance on their part.

The question is also an important one in its public aspects, for, so far as we have observed, it has seldom been brought to the attention of the courts. The counsel for the respondent insists that the question was not before the court in such a manner as required it to pass upon the point involved. Let us inquire of the record whether he is right or not. The answer alleges, among other things, "that the said resolution, purporting to modify said contract, passed by the common council on the 29th day of July, 1890, as set forth in said complaint, was passed collusively, corruptly, and fraudulently, and is the result of a corrupt bargain, in and by which it was agreed that a large sum of money should be paid by said contractors for a vote in favor of said resolution, which said money was paid, and that said resolution, by reason thereof, is null and void and of no effect as a modification of said contract." During the progress of the trial the counsel for the corporation asked several questions which brought to the attention of the court and the counsel for the plaintiffs the defense relied upon by the city, and which we have in part quoted. The court was inclined to the view that the resolution was a legislative act, and could not be thus attacked, whereupon the defendant's counsel, for the purpose of raising the question in the briefest form, said: "I desire to show that Mr. Weston [plaintiff] procured a vote of one member of the common council by corrupt means: that a sum of money was paid by the plaintiff, and accepted by a member of the common council, in consideration of his vote for the adoption of that resolution; and that the vote of such member was obtained and cast by him in consideration of the payment of such sum of money." This offer was denied, and the evidence excluded by the court, the defendant excepting. It is not, of course, claimed that, if the resolution was in fact procured to be passed by bribery, it would, nevertheless, constitute a valid and effective modification of the contract. That it would be void as against public policy is too clear to admit of discussion; but the contention rather is that the courts are without power to inquire into the matter. The reason assigned is that the act of the common council in passing this resolution was legislative in character, and hence the motives that induced the members to vote for its passage, whether honest or corrupt, are not the subject of judicial investigation. It is true that the legislative department of the state government is sovereign, and hence the motives that induce its action cannot be the subject of judicial investigation. The Constitution also empowers the legislature, by general laws, to confer upon boards of supervisors of the counties of the state such powers of local legislation and administration as the legislature may from time to time deem expedient. Const. art. 3, § 27. It has been held that the action of a board of supervisors in undertaking to establish a fire district in a town, under § 37 of the county law, is legislative in character, and therefore not subject to review by certiorari, because the affidavits verifying the petition did not state that the petition complied with the requirements of the statute. People, O'Connor, v. Queens County Supers. 153 N. Y. 370.

In People, Wakeley, v. McIntyre, 154 N. Y. 628, it was held that, within the limits of the power delegated to supervisors by the legislature under the authority conferred upon it by the section referred to, each board of supervisors is clothed with the sovereignty of the state to legislate as to all details, precisely the same as the legislature might have done in the premises. While that is so, there are many duties devolved upon boards of supervisors by the legislature which are not legislative in character, but are administrative, and in some instances quasi judicial in nature, and not at all impressed with the character of sovereignty. Among other duties they are required to audit and allow claims against the county. If they arbitrarily refuse to audit a claim the court may, by mandamus, require them to take action thereon. People, Johnson, v. Delaware County Supers. 45 N. Y. 196, 199. So, where the board of supervisors audit and allow to a public officer a sum in excess of that legally due him, the court will, by mandamus, and upon the application of a taxpayer, require the board to reconsider, revoke, and annul the audit as to such excess. People, Lawrence, v. Westchester County Supers. 73 N. Y. 173. While the acts of boards of supervisors or boards of town auditors, in auditing the accounts within their jurisdiction, are, in the absence of fraud and collusion, final and conclusive, and not the subject of attack in a collateral proceeding, they may, nevertheless, be attacked in such a proceeding in an action brought by a taxpayer, under chapter 161 of the Laws of 1872. Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 222.

Many cases might be cited where boards of supervisors have been compelled to act by mandamus, where they have failed to perform the duties which the law enjoined upon them, as well as cases where their actions, involving legal errors as distinguished from discretionary matters, have been reviewed by certiorari, and also where the audit has been attacked in a collateral action brought under the "Taxpayers' Statute," so called. But it would serve no good purpose, as the cases already cited are sufficient to call attention to the fact that there are many administrative duties of boards of supervisors that are not impressed with the character of sovereignty. So, too, the legislature may confer upon common councils of cities authority to pass municipal ordinances. Such as are passed in pursuance of such authority have the force of law, and are as obligatory as if enacted by the legislature itself. Buffalo v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 152 N. Y. 276. But, like boards of supervisors, a common council has many administrative duties that are not legislative in character, performance of which, at times, has to be compelled by the courts. Not infrequently in the case of special assessments for local improvements, such as the case at bar, actions are successfully prosecuted by taxpayers to set aside assessments against property, on the ground that the assessments are illegal and void. In Miller v. Amsterdam, 149 N. Y. 288, in pursuance of legislative authority, the common council undertook to, and did, pave a certain street, and, to defray the expense thereof, made an assessment against the property specially benefited; but the statute under which the common council attempted to act provided that the street could be paved only upon a petition therefor of the owners of a majority of the lineal feet fronting on the street. The petition presented, and upon which the common council acted, turned out not to have the requisite number of consents. This court held that the action of the common council was without jurisdiction, and affirmed the judgment setting aside the assessment against the property of the plaintiff, upon the ground that it was void. If the common council in Miller's Case, in the institution of proceedings to pave the street, had been acting in a legislative capacity, and was sovereign in that which it did, then, necessarily, it would not have been open for inquiry by the courts whether it had acquired jurisdiction to legislate at all by the petition of the requisite number of lotowners. But it was not sovereign. It had no authority to act at all in the absence of a petition signed by the owners of a majority of the lineal feet fronting on the street, and therefore its proceedings were not in accordance with the directions of the charter; and, in attempting to act as it did, its proceedings were the subject of direct review by certiorari, or to attack in a collateral action such as was made. If the action taken by a common council under the statute to pave a street be not sovereign and free from direct review or collateral attack in the courts, no more is the action of a common council, under a similar statute, to build a sewer; and it is yet more absurd to claim that the resolution by which the common council undertook to effect a compromise and settlement with a contractor to whom something was equitably due, though, perhaps, nothing legally, because of his failure to perform the contract in all respects, constituted a legislative act.

Having established by authority (to which very many citations in point in this state might be added) that the resolution in question constituted a part of the administrative duties of the common council, we come next to the question whether such a resolution, if passed by means of fraud and corruption, can be declared of no effect by the courts. This question is answered in the affirmative by Talcott v. Buffalo, 125 N. Y. 280. That was an action by a taxpayer to prevent waste of or injury to the property of the municipality, the claim being that the common council of the city of Buffalo had passed the resolution over the mayor's veto, providing for the substitution of electric lights for gas, and that, in pursuance of it, 45 L. R. A.

the proper officers had entered into a contract with the electric-light company, by which it had been agreed to pay an exorbitant price; and it was charged that the acts of the common council and its officers in the matter were illegal. The court held that, inasmuch as the action taken by the common council was clearly within its power and discretion, such an action could not be maintained without any charge or allegation of fraud, collusion, corruption, or bad faith. While upon this proposition there was a dissent, all were agreed that under the "Taxpayers' Act," so called, the complaint would not have been demurrable had it alleged that the acts complained of were without power, or that they were the result of corruption, fraud, or bad faith amounting to fraud. That action, it is true, was brought under and by virtue of the provision of the statute giving to taxpayers the right by action in a proper case to interfere with the conduct of municipal officers. The title of the act first passed (Laws 1872, chap. 161) was "An Act for the Protection of Taxpayers against the Frauds, Embezzlements, and Wrongful Acts of Public Officers and Agents." It has since been amended and supplemented by various enactments, which need not now be referred to. This statute did not take away any right of action that the municipality had; and, to avoid any possible opportunity for such a suggestion, the last sentence of the statute provided that it should not be so construed as to take away any right of action from any county, town, or municipal corporation. The history attending the passage of this act, and of chapter 49 of the Laws of 1875, is a matter of common knowledge, and was well stated by Judge Andrews in People v. New York & M. B. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 565, 569, as follows: It "was passed in view of the fact that the city of New York had been grossly defrauded by the acts of municipal officers and others acting in collusion with them, and that large sums had been taken from the municipal treasury in the perpetration of the frauds committed. These sums the city or county, one or both of them, might sue for and recover; but resort to this remedy was embarrassed by the fact that the city and county governments were to a considerable extent under the control of the guilty participants in the fraud."

The effect of the legislation is to enable a taxpayer of the municipality, threatened with injury from its officers, and in certain cases the state, to accomplish by action not more than the proper municipal authorities can at all times accomplish, but such results as the municipal authorities can and should, but, because of carelessness or wilful purpose, will not. If it be the fact that the passage of this resolution was brought about by bribery of the members of the common council, a taxpayer, under the authority of Talcott's Case, 125 N. Y. 280, could have maintained a suit against the city to enjoin it from paying to the contractors the amount claimed by them to be due under their contracts, for the reason that the statute confers upon him the authority to thus interfere for the protection of the municipal corporation; and that which he can accomplish by such a suit, the officers of the municipal corporation, whose duty it is to protect the corporate property from waste and injury, may bring about by a defense to an action brought by the contractor. It is urged by the respondent that the defendant is estopped by the conduct of its officers subsequent to the discovery by the common council of the alleged acts of bribery. But the difficulty with this contention is that it does not appear that the officers of the defendant knew of the alleged bribery at the time of the several acts which the plaintiffs rely upon to create an estoppel. It does appear that, before the commission of some of the acts, the common council caused an investigation of the charge of corruption to be made; but it is not shown that one of the outcomes of the investigation was the disclosure of the alleged acts of bribery that the defendant upon the trial offered to prove, and therefore it cannot be said that the action taken by the common council was with full knowledge of the situation.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, modifying a judgment of a Special Term for Kings County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to enforce the alleged liability of defendants for a bond debt of their ancestor. Reversed.

Statement by Parker, Ch. J.:

In August, 1878, one John G. Latimer executed his bond with a mortgage on a lot and building on Atlantic street, Brooklyn, to secure the sum of $18,000, borrowed by him. The plaintiff subsequently acquired that bond and mortgage. In 1884 Latimer died intestate, seised of the mortgaged premises, leaving a widow and four brothers (the three defendants and one James D. Latimer) his only heirs at law. Letters of administration were issued on the estate of John G. Latimer, and upon settlement of the estate it appeared that the personal estate was exhausted by the payment of the debts and expenses of administration, leaving a deficiency in the amount due for administrator's fees. The deceased left real estate of considerable value, all of which was, prior to the commencement of this action, sold by the three defendants Latimer, as heirs at law, for the aggregate sum of $57,500, the value of the widow's dower in which was estimated at $8,426, leaving the net value of the lands sold in the hands of each of the defendants at the time of the trial at $12,268.50, outside of the mortgaged premises. The latter were conveyed, during the years 1888 and 1889, to Frederick B. Latimer, by bargain and sale deeds, each reciting the consideration of $1. After Frederick had acquired all the interest of his brothers in the mortgaged premises, he and the plaintiff executed the following agreement:

We agree that the time for the payment of the bond and mortgage for $18,000 on 201 and 203 Atlantic avenue, Brooklyn, made by John G. Latimer to the executors of Noah T. Pike, and recorded in the register's office of Kings county in Liber 1425 of Mortgages, page 17, August 24, 1878, being the date thereof, shall be, and hereby is, extended to May 1, 1895, subject to the same terms and conditions, including tax, insurance, and interest clauses, as at present.

Dated New York, October 15, 1891.

Dwight H. Olmstead, Executor & Trustee under Will of Noah T. Pike.

F. B. Latimer.

In April 1892, a fire occurred in the buildings on the mortgaged premises, by which they were partially injured. In an attempt to restore the buildings they collapsed, and became a total loss. By this accident the value of the mortgaged premises fell below the amount of the mortgage. Thereafter the plaintiff instituted this action to foreclose the mortgage, and hold the defendants, as heirs at law of the original bondsmen and mortgagor, liable for any deficiency. The trial court held the defendant Frederick liable for 16-75 of any deficiency, and the other defendants not liable. From this decree the plaintiff and the defendant Frederick appealed to the appellate division; the former seeking to hold all the defendants, the latter to be relieved from liability. The court modified the judgment by increasing the liability of the defendant Frederick to one quarter of any deficiency that may arise on the foreclosure sale, and in all other respects affirmed the judgment.

Mr. Charles D. Ridgway, for appellant:

The defendants are necessary parties to the action, and may be held for any deficiency which may arise on the sale of the mortgaged premises.

Code, § 1843; Collin's Petition, 6 Abb. N. C. 227; Glaciux v. Fogel, 88 N. Y. 434; Collier v. Miller, 62 Hun, 99; Rogers v. Patterson, 79 Hun, 484.

The fact that Frederick B. Latimer, after he had received a deed for the mortgaged premises from his brothers, obtained an extension of the time of payment of the bond and mortgage from the plaintiff from May 1, 1892, to May 1, 1895, does not discharge any of the defendants from the payment of the bond to the extent of the value of the real estate descended to them.

So far as the value of the lands of the decedent remaining in their hands was concerned defendants were not jointly, but severally, liable.

Belmont v. Ooman, 22 N. Y. 438, 78 Am. Dec. 213; Smith v. Cornell, 111 N. Y. 554; Chilton v. Brooks, 72 Md. 554.

The principle of suretyship is only invoked to prevent a fraud or a wrong, but never to perpetrate one.

No case can be found which decides that the relation of principal and surety exists between a grantor and a grantee when the grantor is not a mortgagor and has not paid anything for the mortgaged premises, but who is by law, because of his possession of funds of the obligor, personally liable for the debt.

Wadsworth v. Lyon, 93 N. Y. 201, 45 Am. Rep. 190; Hauselt v. Patterson, 124 N. Y. 361.

The relation of principal and surety did not exist between the several defendants because by the Revised Statutes they were required to pay the mortgage debt out of their own property. They were each primarily liable, not jointly but severally, for his share of the debt.

Palmer v. Purdy, 83 N. Y. 145.

Admitting the relation of principal and surety did exist between Frederick B. Latimer and the other defendants after the execution of the deeds, still there was no valid extension of the mortgage, and consequently no discharge of the other defendants.

Halliday v. Hart, 30 N. Y. 474; Lowman v. Yates, 37 N. Y. 601; Gahn v. Niemcewicz, 11 Wend. 312; Vilas v. Jones, 10 Paige, 76; Reynolds v. Ward, 5 Wend. 501; Draper v. Romeyn, 18 Barb. 166; Kellogg v. Olmsted, 25 N. Y. 189; Babcock v. Kuntzsch, 66 N. Y. S. R. 47.

There was no positive duty incumbent upon plaintiff to have prosecuted the foreclosure of the mortgage with active diligence. He had a right to rely upon the bond for payment, and the defendants are not discharged by mere delay.

Goldsmith v. Brown, 35 Barb. 484; Mercantiles' Ins. Co. v. Hinman, 34 Barb. 410; Schroepf v. Shanc, 3 N. Y. 446.

Any of the defendants could have paid the debt of his ancestor in order to relieve his own lands and been subrogated to the rights of the plaintiff, or he might have demanded a foreclosure of the mortgage in order to protect himself. But until he has done this he cannot complain.

Marshall v. Davies, 78 N. Y. 414; Blake v. Move, 32 N. Y. S. R. 917; Hunt v. Purdy, 82 N. Y. 486, 37 Am. Rep. 587.

Mr. Francis L. Noble, with Messrs. Charles J. McDermott and Paul E. Towne, for respondents:

The right of a creditor of a deceased intestate to maintain an action against the heirs at law of such decedent to recover for the debts of said decedent is regulated by statute.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1837-1860.

This liability is a joint liability, and an action against the heirs must be brought jointly against them all.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1846.

The unsecured creditors acting through the administrators could have compelled a foreclosure of this mortgage before the mortgagee could have made any claim to diminish the general fund of the personal estate for the payment of such mortgage debt.

Johnson v. Corbett, 11 Paige, 265; Hauselt v. Patterson, 124 N. Y. 349.

This being so, the personal representatives stand in the relation of sureties toward the mortgaged premises.

The liability of an heir at law, however, is secondary to that of a personal representative.

1 Rev. Stat. 2 Banks, 9th ed. 1822, 749, § 4.

In case of the death of the mortgagor the order of the liability is this: (1) The mortgaged premises; (2) the personal estate; (3) the heirs at law.

Wilbur v. Warren, 104 N. Y. 192; Hauselt v. Patterson, 124 N. Y. 349; Code Civ. Proc. § 1848.

The written extension of the mortgage given by the plaintiff to the defendant Frederick B. Latimer is a valid extension.

After breach of a sealed agreement it may be modified by an executed parol agreement for a sufficient consideration.

Dodge v. Crandall, 30 N. Y. 304.

Such extension does not alter the agreement or terms of a sealed contract, but is a new contract to hold the original contract in abeyance.

Homer v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 67 N. Y. 481; San Remo Hotel Co. v. Brennan, 64 Hun, 611.

No new consideration was necessary to give validity to the agreement to extend the time for performance. The waiver is sufficient for that purpose.

Burt v. Saaton, 1 Hun, 551; Clark v. Dales, 20 Barb. 42.

But if such new consideration were necessary it exists in this case. The payment of interest by one not previously bound to pay the same is a good consideration for the agreement to extend the time for payment of the principal.

Grinnan v. Platt, 31 Barb. 328; Jester v. Sterling, 25 Hun, 344.

The agreement for the extension had expired and the contract was an executed one before this action was commenced.

Fuller v. Kemp, 138 N. Y. 231, 20 L. R. A. 785; Thomson v. Poor, 147 N. Y. 402.

Even where no personal liability exists an extension of time for the payment of the mortgage operates to release one personally liable for the debt who does not consent to such extension to the extent of the value of the land at the time the agreement to extend the same was made.

Paine v. Jones, 76 N. Y. 274; Murray v. Marshall, 94 N. Y. 611; Spencer v. Spencer, 95 N. Y. 353.

The interest which James D. Latimer took in the lands of John G. Latimer, though by descent it afterwards passed to the defendants, cannot be reached in this action.

Fink v. Berg, 50 Hun, 211; Platt v. Platt, 105 N. Y. 490; Rogers v. Patterson, 79 Hun, 483.

Parker, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants Latimer, as heirs at law of the mortgagor, were respectively liable, under § 1843 of the Code, for the debts of the said mortgagor decedent to the extent of their interest in the real property that descended to them from him. The premises covered by the mortgage were primarily liable to pay the mortgage debt. As there was no personal estate, the defendants were secondarily liable, and they were properly made parties in the action of foreclosure by virtue of § 1627 of the Code, which provides that "any person who is liable to the plaintiff for the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage may be made a defendant in the action; and if he has appeared, or has been personally served with the summons, the final judgment may award payment by him" of any deficiency. The judgment, as it comes to us, decrees that the defendant Frederick B. Latimer shall pay one quarter of the deficiency, but it has been held that the effect of the conveyance of the premises to the defendant Frederick by his brothers in the years 1888 and 1889, together with the fact that he informed the plaintiff of such conveyance, and thereafter made an agreement to extend the time of payment of the bond and mortgage, had the legal effect of making Frederick the principal debtor, and his brothers, sureties, and hence that the effect of the agreement extending the time of payment operated to release the sureties from all liability to the plaintiff on account of the indebtedness evidenced by the bond. Assuming, but not deciding, that the effect of the conveyance, and that which subsequently happened, was to change the obligation of the defendants other than Frederick towards the plaintiff from that of principals to that of sureties, we come to the question whether the agreement to extend the time of payment was invalid for want of consideration.

There are several decisions in this court in which the question has been considered, and they are in harmony with one another. In Kellogg v. Olmsted, 25 N. Y. 189, the action was on a promissory note by the transferee of the payee. The answer alleged that, after the note became due, it was mutually agreed between the holder thereof, the payee, and the defendants "that, in consideration that the defendants would keep the principal sum of the said note until the 1st day of April, 1857, and pay the same, with interest, on that day, he, the said Covil [payee] would extend the time of payment of the principal of said note until the 1st day of April, 1857; that the said defendants then and there assented to such proposition, and then and there agreed to and with said Covil to keep said principal sum of said note until the 1st day of April, 1857, and to pay the same with interest on that day." On the trial of the action the referee excluded evidence offered by the defendants to establish the defense so specially set up, and exceptions were taken thereto that presented the question to this court. It was held that an agreement by a creditor to postpone payment of a debt until a future day certain, without other or further consideration than the agreement of the debtor to pay the debt, with interest, is void for want of consideration; the court citing, in support of its position, Miller v. Holbrook, 1 Wend. 317; Gibson v. Renne, 19 Wend. 390; Pabodie v. King, 12 Johns. 426; Reynolds v. Ward, 5 Wend. 501; Fulton v. Matthews, 15 Johns. 433, 8 Am. Dec. 261. A dissenting opinion was written by Judge Davies, who, two or three years later, wrote the principal opinion in Halliday v. Hart, 30 N. Y. 474. In that case the action was brought to recover against the maker and two indorsers on a promissory note. The indorsers defended on the ground that the plaintiff had, for a valuable consideration, and in writing, extended the time of payment for a period of some months, and claimed that the effect of such extension was to discharge the sureties from liability. The authorities bearing upon the question were very carefully considered, and the court decided that a partial payment by the maker on account of an overdue note is not a valid consideration for a promise of forbearance as to the residue, so as to discharge the indorsers. A concurring opinion was written by Judge Hogeboom, in which he says: "The sureties were not discharged. There was no valid agreement for the extension of the time of payment. There was no payment of any sum which the party paying was not obliged to pay. The performance of an unqualified legal obligation by payment of part of a sum due upon a note is not a valid consideration for the extension of payment of the remainder."

The next case in this court was Lowman v. Yates, 37 N. Y. 601. The action was upon a bond given by Ely as principal, with Parmenter as surety, conditioned that Ely should, before a given date, take up and deliver to the plaintiff two mortgages, executed by him, amounting to $10,000. The action was brought against the personal representatives of the surety, the principal having died. The defense relied upon was that the plaintiff, without the surety's consent, took from the principal four negotiable promissory notes, to be applied upon the bond for the payment in the aggregate of about $7,000 of principal, three, three and a half, four, and five years after date, and indorsed the same upon the bond, thereby extending the time of payment, and discharging the defendant as surety. The court, recognizing the principle that a creditor by a valid and binding agreement between himself and the principal debtor, extending the time of payment without the consent of the surety, thereby discharges the latter from liability, said that, in order that an agreement shall accomplish that result, it must have a sufficient consideration, so as to prevent the prosecution of the debt by the owner, and to prevent the surety from compelling him to enforce it. It was claimed by the plaintiff that he was induced to enter into the agreement, and take notes extending the time of payment, by the fraudulent representations made by the principal debtor, and it was held that the court properly left it to the jury to determine whether the notes were imposed on the plaintiff by fraud, and, if so, that their receipt by the plaintiff under the agreement did not operate to extend the time of payment of so much of the amount of the bond as their face value represented. It was also held that the judge properly charged that, in any event, the extension of the time of payment did not discharge the surety as to the residue of the bond beyond the amount of the notes. In Parmelee v. Thompson, 45 N. Y. 58, 6 Am. Rep. 33, one of the makers of a promissory note after maturity paid to the payee a sum equal to the amount due thereon, and took possession of the note. Subsequently he brought suit against another maker, who gave evidence tending to show that while the payee held the note an action was brought thereon in the supreme court, and that it was agreed between the defendants and the plaintiff therein that the suit should be discontinued, the defendant to pay the costs, and have until the ensuing December to pay the note; that the costs were paid, and the suit discontinued, after which the plaintiff became the owner of the note, and brought the action before the expiration of the time agreed upon, and the trial judge held that there was no valid agreement to extend the time of payment. The judgment was affirmed in this court, the opinion being written by Judge Allen, in which he said: "It is competent for the parties by a parol agreement to enlarge the time of performance of a simple contract.

. . . But a promise to extend the time of payment, unless founded on a good consideration, is void. A payment of a part of the debt, or the interest already accrued, or a promise to pay interest for the future, is not a sufficient consideration to support such promise,"—citing Miller v. Holbrook, 1 Wend. 317, Gibson v. Renne, 19 Wend. 390, and Kellogg v. Olmsted, 25 N. Y. 189.

In Powers v. Silberstein, 108 N. Y. 169, the action was brought upon a promissory note made by the firm of Joy & Bowman, and indorsed by the defendant Silberstein, who alone answered, setting up as a defense that the note was indorsed by him for the accommodation of the makers, and that the time of payment was extended by an agreement, made without his consent, between the makers and the plaintiff. The plaintiff had judgment in the trial court, which was affirmed at the general term, but reversed in 43 L. R. A.

this court on the ground that there was evidence tending to establish that the plaintiff, after the maturity of the note, agreed with the makers, Joy & Bowman, to forbear the collection of it if they would continue plaintiff's son in their employment, and that Joy & Bowman consented, and did retain him in their service, upon this consideration. In the course of the opinion the court cited Lowman v. Yates, 37 N. Y. 601, upon the proposition that a mere indulgence by a creditor of the principal debtor will not discharge the surety, and that the agreement for an extension, made without the consent of the surety, must be upon a valid consideration, such as will preclude the creditor from enforcing the debt against the principal; but argued that the plaintiff did not deny that the employment of his son was an inducement to the original loan, or that the subject of his continuing employment was referred to in his conversation with the makers of the note after maturity; and that, taken in consideration with the fact that the loan was allowed to remain standing for three years after the maturity of the note, presented a question for the jury as to whether there was an extension of the time upon a good consideration.

Our attention has not been called to any authority in this court in hostility to the position taken in the decisions we have referred to. The rule laid down by them has been followed in many cases in the trial courts, and among them may be found the comparatively recent cases of Manchester v. Van Brunt, 46 N. Y. S. R. 506, and Babcock v. Kuntzsch, 85 Hun, 615, 66 N. Y. S. R. 47. The reasons assigned by the learned justice who wrote for the appellate division in favor of overthrowing the doctrine of these cases, while presented with marked ability and clearness, are not at all new. They were advanced in the dissenting opinion by Judge Davies in Kellogg v. Olmsted, 25 N. Y. 189, the first case in which the question received attention in this court, so far as we are advised. Whether the reasoning of the prevailing or dissenting opinion seems the better, it is not profitable to inquire, for the question was settled by the decision of this court, and has by later adjudications become so firmly grounded that it may not now be questioned.

The judgment should be reversed as to the defendants Henry A. and Brainard G. Latimer, and that of the special term modified by striking out the direction to the referee to pay costs to Brainard G. and Henry A. Latimer, and so further modified as to adjudge that the defendants Frederick B. Latimer, Henry A. Latimer, and Brainard G. Latimer each pay to the plaintiff one quarter of any deficiency that may arise on the sale of the mortgaged premises under said judgment, and as thus modified affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

IOWA SAVINGS & LOAN ASSOCIATION, Appt.,
v.
Lawrence HEIDT et al.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The necessary expenses of perfecting a loan may be taken out of the money loaned to a member by a loan association.
2. A deduction of a specified part of the dues paid to a loan association for necessary expenses of management is lawful.
3. The exaction of an arbitrary sum in addition to interest from a borrower, when there is no competition, is not authorized by Code 1873, title 9, chap. 6, allowing premiums bid for the right of precedence in taking loans.
4. Charging full legal interest on a sum made up of the money actually paid over to the borrower and the necessary expenses of perfecting the loan does not constitute usury.
5. A fine of 5 cents for the first default on each share, and 10 cents for each subsequent default by a member of a loan association, is not exorbitant.
6. Statutes exempting building and loan associations from the operation of the usury law are not unconstitutional as class legislation.
7. A curative act which merely takes away the privilege of pleading usury does not change the agreement, but only removes a bar to its enforcement, and is not an unconstitutional impairment of a vested right.

(January 24, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the District Court for Polk County in its favor for an amount less than demanded in a suit brought to foreclose a mortgage and cancel certain shares of stock held by defendant in the plaintiff association. Modified.

Statement by Waterman, J.:

Action in equity to foreclose a mortgage on real estate, and to cancel certain shares of stock held by defendant in plaintiff association. Defense usury, which was sustained by the trial court. An accounting was had. A judgment of forfeiture was given in favor of the school fund, and plaintiff was awarded a decree for the sum of $72.80, without either interest or costs. It appeals.

Messrs. Baily & Ballreich, for appellant:

The contract as made was not usurious.

The contract was a mutual arrangement by which the defendant as a member shared in the profits derived from the premium and interest paid by himself and other borrowers, and the time of maturing his stock was thereby hastened. If the contract was usurious then he was both a payer and receiver of usury, and entitled to no relief at the hands of the court.

If the contract as made was usurious, it was cured and legalized by the laws passed by the 26th and 27th general assembly.

It was competent for the legislature to cure and legalize usurious contracts.

The plea of usury pertains to the remedy. The contract is not void, but is subject to certain penalties which will not be imposed except at the instance of the original contractor.

No citizen has a vested right in a course of practice or particular remedy, and the legislature may modify or change a remedy or substitute a new remedy.

Usury laws are penal in their nature and the repeal of the law takes away the right to sue for the penalty or to interpose the provisions of the law as a defense to a contract made while the law was in force.

Messrs. Dudley, Coffin, & Byers, for appellees:

The contract is usurious because the premium was not a bid for precedence.

Heider*, 55 Iowa, 424.

The Code of 1873 refers to purely mutual building associations. It does not authorize any premium except one determined by competition, the consideration for which is the right of precedence, and not the use of the money loaned.

The premium must be a bona fide bid, made by one member for the right of precedence over his fellow members in obtaining a loan.

The contract is usurious because the interest was charged upon the gross amount of the loan.

The contract is usurious because the fines charged and paid were exorbitant and unconscionable.

Although the general rule obtains that the repeal of a penalty has retroactive effect in the absence of a saving clause, that rule is not in force in this state because we have just such a saving statute.

Seawell v. Hendricks, 4 Okla. 435; National Bank v. Lemke, 3 N. D. 154; United States v. Reisinger, 128 U. S. 398, 32 L. ed. 480; *Western U. Teleg. Co. v. The doctrine that usury is in the nature of a penalty which cannot be enforced after the repeal of the law authorizing it applies only where there is no saving statute that provides that the repeal of a penalty shall not affect a penalty already incurred.

Jenness v. Cutler, 12 Kan. 500; National 43 L. R. A.

Bank v. Lemke, 3 N. D. 154; Seawell v. Hendricks, 4 Okla. 435.

This rule is confined to the penalty strictly, and is never extended to any matter that relates in any way to the obligation of the contract.

Hunter v. Hatch, 45 Ill. 178; Seegar v. Seegar, 19 Ill. 121; Parmelee v. Lawrence, 44 Ill. 405, 48 Ill. 331; Drake v. Latham, 50 Ill. 270.

That doctrine is squarely in conflict with better reasoned cases.

Pond v. Horne, 65 N. C. 84; Whitaker v. Pope, 2 Woods, 463; Rpot v. Pinney, 11 Wis. 85; Lincoln v. Cross, 11 Wis. 94; Wood v. Lake, 13 Wis. 94; Lee v. Peckham, 17 Wis. 383; Morton v. Rutherford, 19 Wis. 299; Lincoln Bldg. & Sav. Asso. v. Graham, 7 Neb. 173; Livingston Loan & Bldg. Asso. v. Drummond, 49 Neb. 200.

The repeal of the usury law does not take away the right to plead usury because it is a repeal of the usury law, but because it is a repeal of the usury penalty.

The change in our building and loan law is an instance where the penalty remains, but the law defining usury is modified.

Maynard v. Marshall, 91 Ga. 840; Lincoln Bldg. & Sav. Asso. v. Graham, 7 Neb. 173; Livingston Loan & Bldg. Asso. v. Drummond, 49 Neb. 200; Reiser v. William Tell Sav. Fund Asso. 39 Pa. 137; Houser v. Hermann Bldg. Asso. 41 Pa. 478.

The building and loan laws of the state are unconstitutional.

Monticello Mut. Bldg. L. & Homestead Asso. v. Smythe (Ill.) 9 Rep. 714; Holmes v. Smythe, 100 Ill. 420; Citizens' Security & Land Co. v. Uhler, 48 Md. 458; Henderson Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Winchester Bldg. & Accumulating Fund Asso. 12 Bush, 111, 23 Am. Rep. 713.

To be a premium the consideration for it must not be the use of the money loaned, but must be some right arising out of the membership relation.

The defendant is entitled to credit upon the principal for everything he has paid, and the plaintiff is entitled to the balance of the principal without interest or costs, and judgment should be entered for the benefit of the school fund for the interest at 8 per cent per annum upon this balance for the time the loan has run.

Waterman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff is a building and loan association, having incorporated as such originally in 1889. On July 2, 1896, its articles were amended to comply with the requirements of chapter 85, Acts 26th Gen. Assem. Defendant was the owner of ten shares of stock in said association, and on February 15, 1891, he borrowed from it the sum of $1,000, giving as security his shares of stock in pledge and the mortgage in suit. At the time of making the loan, plaintiff deducted from the amount of the loan the following sums: Attorney's fee for examining abstract, $2.50; appraiser's fee, $2; recording mortgage, $1; abstractor's fee, $9. The remainder, $985.50, was paid to defendant. Defendant was to pay, according to the contract contained in his note and mortgage, the sum of $17 per month until the maturity of his stock. This amount was made up as follows: 60 cents per share, instalments on his stock, $6; 60 cents per share, premium for the loan, $6; and 50 cents per share as interest on the money received, $5. Out of the dues on stock the association deducted 7 cents from each 60 cents paid, for expenses of management, but only so much of this was used or kept as was necessary for actual expenses. From time to time the surplus of the expense fund was carried to the credit of the stockholders.

1. It is claimed that defendant did not receive the full amount of his loan, and this is correct. But the amounts deducted were necessary expenses in perfecting the loan. These sums were not retained by the association, but were paid to others, and were proper charges against defendant. Hawkeye State Sav. & L. Asso. v. Johnston, 106 Iowa, 218.

Some complaint is also made because of the deduction by the association of 7 cents out of each 60 cents of dues, for expense of management. We see no ground for a member's objection to this method. It is not claimed that more was used for expenses than was actually necessary. Now, it is apparent that these expenses had to be paid by the members. If a fund was not raised in this way, the amount would have to be taken from the earnings. In any event the burden would fall on the stockholders.

2. With these minor matters out of the way, we take up the next question in the case, which is the claim of usury. It is said 43 L. R. A.

(1) that the contract is usurious, because the premium exacted was not bid for the right of precedence in taking the loan; (2) because interest was charged upon the face of the loan; and (3) because the fines and fees were exorbitant. It is true that the premium was a fixed sum, established by the by-laws of the association, and chapter 6, title 9, Code 1873, was in force when this loan was made. In that chapter such associations are given the right to receive "premiums bid by members for the right of precedence in taking loans," and then it is said the taking of such premiums shall not be held to be usury. We are of the opinion that, under that statute, it was not lawful for the association to exact from a borrower, where there was no competition, an arbitrary sum in addition to the interest on his loan, where the whole amounted to more than legal interest; and we may say, without setting out the computation, that we think it did in this case. In Burlington Mut. L. Asso. v. Heider, 55 Iowa, 424, and Hawkeye Bcn. & L. Asso. v. Blackburn, 48 Iowa, 385, each of which involved a construction of the statute we are now considering, while usury was pleaded, the question presented now was not raised. Except in name, the premium here does not differ in any way from interest. It is paid for the use of the money, and not for the privilege of getting the loan. As it is claimed that the acts of plaintiff in exacting from defendant the various sums it did as consideration for the loan were validated by subsequent legislation, it may be well for us to determine to just what extent curative acts were needed. We take up, therefore, defendant's further claims of usury.

3. It is said that the loan was usurious, because interest was charged on the face of the note, and not the amount actually paid to defendant. The two cases last cited are thought by counsel for appellee to support this claim. In those cases the premium charged for the loan was deducted at the time the loan was made, and was retained by the association for its benefit, and interest was collected upon the whole sum, including the amount of the premium; and this interest exceeded the rate fixed by law. The items which defendant claims should not have been included in the principal in the case at bar, and upon which interest was computed, are the $2.50 for examining abstract and $2 appraisement fee. Both of these were legitimate matters of expense, as we have already said. As we understand the record, while the $2 fee was paid into the expense fund, it was the exact amount that was paid by the association out of that fund for the appraisement in the making of this loan; and the other fee was paid to an attorney for services actually rendered. The payment by the borrower of the necessary expenses of the lender, incurred in making the loan, in addition to the legal interest, will not constitute usury. Smith v. Wolf, 55 Iowa, 555. These amounts were not exacted as a bonus by the association, and it got no benefit whatever from their payment. This case is materially different from those upon which defendant relies.

5. As we have found that the contract was tainted with usury because of the exaction of the level or arbitrary premium, it now becomes necessary to determine whether it has been purged of this illegality by subsequent legislation. This loan was made in 1891. In 1896 the 26th general assembly passed an act (chap. 85) providing for the government, management, and operation of associations of this character. Section 9 of that act, so far as material, is as follows: "All building and loan and savings and loan associations upon receiving the certificate of the auditor shall have power . . . to assess and collect from members such dues, membership fees, fines, premiums, and interest on loans as may, in the articles of incorporation and by-laws have been provided, and the same shall not be held to be usurious . . . to make loans to members on such terms and conditions as the articles of incorporation and by-laws provide. . . . In case of foreclosure the borrower shall be charged with the full amount of the loan made to him, together with the dues, interest, premium, and fines for which he is delinquent, and he shall be credited with the same value of his pledged shares as if he had voluntarily withdrawn the same." It is claimed by plaintiff that this section applied to contracts made prior to its passage, and validated acts already done. This law is not expressly made retroactive, and we should hesitate before giving it that effect, especially to the extent claimed by plaintiff. But in view of our holding upon another statute, which is set up, and which we shall next consider, it is not necessary that we decide this question.

6. Section 9, which we have set out, with some changes not material to be noticed here, went into the present Code as § 1898. The 27th general assembly, by chapter 48 amended this section, as follows: "The provisions of said section shall apply to and govern all contracts between building and loan and savings and loan associations and their members, made and entered into prior to the taking effect of the Code, and every such contract shall in all actions and proceedings be construed and enforced as in said 43 L. R. A.

section provided, and with the same force and effect as if made and entered into after the Code took effect anything in the statutes in force when such contracts were made to the contrary notwithstanding." We think this act was intended to make valid and enforceable all previous contracts for loans, which were within the terms of § 1898, as the contract in suit clearly was.

The next question is as to the legislative power to do this. As a general rule, it may be said the legislature can validate any act which it might originally have authorized. Windsor v. Des Moines, 101 Iowa, 343; Clinton v. Walliker, 98 Iowa, 655. A number of objections are made to the application of this rule to the case at bar. First, it is said that the building and loan law of the state is unconstitutional, because it is class legislation. Some of the arguments advanced in support of this claim assail rather the policy of such statutes than the power to enact them. In theory, these institutions are profit-sharing. The amounts directly paid for the use of money go indirectly to the benefit of the stockholders, through the increase in the value of their shares. Where the loans are confined to shareholders, we can see good reason for exempting such associations from the operation of the usury law. That the constitutional power exists to make this exemption, we think, is without serious doubt. People's Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Billing, 104 Mich. 186; Vermont Loan & T. Co. v. Whithed, 2 N. D. 82; Archer v. Baltimore Bldg. & L. Asso. 45 W. Va. —, 30 S. E. 241. See also on the general character of these institutions, and the reasons for special legislation in their favor, Harkins v. Americus Nat. Bldg. & L. Asso. 96 Ga. 206; Granite State Provident Asso. v. Monk (N. J. Eq.) 30 Atl. 872; Natchez Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Shields, 71 Miss. 630. Next it is said the curative act is invalid, so far as this case is concerned, for to give it effect as against defendant would impair vested rights. The act in question was passed after the decree was rendered by the trial court in this case; and for this reason it is thought that defendant's rights had so accrued and vested as that they could not be disturbed or altered by such legislation. In Clinton v. Walliker, 98 Iowa, 655, the curative act was given application to a contract involved in a suit which was pending when the act was passed. The same holding was made in Tuttle v. Polk, 84 Iowa, 12. Richman v. Muscatine County Supers. 77 Iowa, 513, 4 L. R. A. 445, was a certiorari proceeding to test the validity of an assessment and levy of a tax for building a levee. In a former proceeding, the action of the board of supervisors had been set aside, and the assessment declared void, by the circuit court, and this holding was affirmed by this court. After this final judgment, the general assembly passed an act authorizing a new assessment. This was had, and proceedings were again instituted to test the validity of the tax levied under the curative act. This last is the case we have cited. It was urged by the petitioners that they had vested rights under the first decision, but the claim was denied by this court. In Huff v. Cook, 44 Iowa, 639, defendant, a woman, claimed to have been elected to the office of county superintendent. In a proceeding to test her right to the office, the trial court held that she was ineligible because of her sex. She appealed. After the judgment below an act was passed by the general assembly, which in effect declared that no person previously elected to such office should be disqualified from holding the same because of sex. It was held by this court that the bringing of an action vests no right to a particular decision, and that defendant being eligible, when final judgment was pronounced, it should go in her favor. See also Iowa Railroad Land Co. v. Soper, 39 Iowa, 112, 124. It is difficult to perceive what right of the plaintiff in the case at bar was disturbed by the curative act, other than a mere privilege of pleading usury; and this pertains only to the remedy, which, it is uniformly held, may be altered at the legislative will. Kossuth County v. Wallace, 60 Iowa, 508; State v. Squires, 26 Iowa, 340. So far as the payments made and fines imposed are concerned, they were in accord with the terms of defendant's contract. The effect of the subsequent legislation was not to change the agreement, but only to remove a bar to its enforcement. The cause being triable de novo in this court, there seems no legal objection to the entering of a decree in conformity with the law as it now exists.

7. It is further urged against the validity of the subsequent legislation that it allows a recovery which may be greater than the amount fixed by the contract in some cases; and it is said that, in the case at bar, plaintiff could recover more under the law than it could lawfully claim on its contract. But, so far as plaintiff is concerned, it is seeking nothing more than its contract calls for. Furthermore, we do not think the measure of recovery specified in the law is meant to be mandatory, in the sense that the parties may not make a contract more favorable to the debtor, by which they will be bound. The law fixes the maximum of recovery against a debtor, but we can see no reason why, within the limit specified, an agreement for a different settlement may not be made.

8. Plaintiff is entitled to a judgment for the sum of $571.80 with interest at 8 per cent from November 1, 1895, the date of defendant's default. We find this amount by adding the dividends to the dues and premiums paid, which makes a total of $428.20 and deducting this from the face value of the note. We have made no deduction from defendant's credits for expenses, because we are unable to determine what the actual expenses were. The amount plaintiff withheld from premiums for this purpose is given; but it appears that this was often too liberal an allowance, and left a balance to be carried to the loan fund. Plaintiff is entitled to charge defendant only for his share of the actual and necessary expense of management, and, as is said, we cannot determine what this would be. It is manifest from what has been 43 L. R. A.

said that the judgment in favor of the school fund is erroneous. Under the circumstances, we think an apportionment of the costs should be made. Following the rule applied in Iowa Railroad Land Co. v. Soper, 39 Iowa, 112, 124, the costs, both of the court below and of this court, will be equally divided between the parties.

Modified as we have suggested, the decree against defendant will be affirmed.

Robinson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The certificate in suit was issued to one Louis L. Feder, and entitled him to all the benefits accruing from membership in the defendant by virtue of its constitution and by-laws. When the certificate was issued, an article of the constitution of the defendant provided that "whenever the death of a member of this association in good standing shall occur from any accidental cause (except while such member shall be under the influence of intoxicating liquors or narcotics)," and proofs thereof should be made, the proceeds of an assessment of $2 on each member of the association, not exceeding the sum of $5,000, should be paid to the beneficiary named in the certificate, or to his heirs or legal representatives: provided, however, that if, at the time of such death, the amount of money in the treasury of the association not otherwise appropriated should exceed the sum of $5,500, payment of $5,000 was to be made from the money in the treasury. On the 18th day of April, 1894, Feder died. At that time he was a member of the association in good standing, and this action is brought on the certificate, to recover the sum of $5,000. The validity of the certificate is admitted, the death of Feder is not disputed, and notice and proofs of his death are shown. We are required to determine whether there was sufficient evidence tending to show that Feder's death resulted "from an accidental cause" to require the submission of the case to the jury.

The evidence tended to establish the following: The decedent, at the time of his death, was about twenty-six years of age, and had been in Denver, where his death occurred, about nine months. He was suffering from consumption, and went to Denver, and resided there, on account of his health. He was benefited by the change of climate and medical treatment he received, and his health had been considerably improved, and was constantly improving, at the time of his death. During the day of his death he had been as well as usual, and in the evening was with two of his brothers in their office. Preparatory to leaving it the decedent went to a window to close the shutters. A chair stood in front of the window, and he stood on his toes, and reached over the chair towards the shutters, and, as he did so, blood began to flow from his mouth. He was placed on a lounge, and died within a few minutes. The cause of his death was hemorrhage from a ruptured artery, and the evidence would have authorized the conclusion that the rupture of the artery was not due to the disease from which he was suffering. There is no evidence that he fell, slipped, lost his balance, failed to catch the shutter when he reached for it, or that it moved at his touch more or less readily than he had expected it would move; in other words, there is no evidence whatever that anything was done or occurred which he had not foreseen and planned, excepting the rupture of the artery, and the consequences which resulted from it.

Did his death result "from an accidental cause"? Various definitions of the word "accident" are quoted by the appellants, and among them are the following: It is an "unexpected event which happens as by chance, or which does not take place according to the usual course of things." North American Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43, 8 Am. Rep. 212. "The equitable definition of the term 'accident' includes not only inevitable casualties, and such as are caused by the act of God, but also those that arise from unforeseen occurrences, misfortunes, losses, and acts or omissions of other persons, without the fault, negligence, or misconduct of the party" injured. Bostwick v. Stiles, 35 Conn. 198. "An event which takes place without one's foresight or expectation;" and it may include an injury received in a common-law affray, without the fault of the person injured. Supreme Council, O. of C. F. v. Garrigus, 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 298. "An event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an event which proceeds from an unknown cause, or is an unusual effect of a known cause, and, therefore, not expected." Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 30, 1 Am. Rep. 157. "An accident is the happening of an event without the aid and the design of the person, and which is unforeseen." Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L. R. A. 443. "An event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an undesignated, sudden, and unexpected event." Webster, International Dict. See also, Fidelity Casualty Co. v. Johnson, 72 Miss. 333, 30 L. R. A. 206; Carnes v. Iowa Traveling Men's Assn. 106 Iowa, 281. The ordinary and popular meaning of the word "accidental" is said to be "happening by chance; unexpectedly taking place; not according to the usual course of things; or not as expected." United States Mut. Acci. Assn. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60.

It is argued that the rupture of a blood vessel is not the usual result of an effort to close shutters; therefore, when it occurs, it is unusual, unexpected, and an accident. While it may be true that an accident is an event which takes place without one's foresight or expectation, and is undesigned, it is not true that every unforeseen, undesigned, and unexpected event is an "accident," within the ordinary and popular meaning of that term. Thus, a person might voluntarily and knowingly expose himself to a contagious disease, or to excessive heat or cold, or to sudden changes of temperature, or might adopt a strange diet or mode of living; but, if death resulted, it would not be due to an accidental cause, although wholly undesigned, unforeseen, and unexpected. So, if a person suffering from some weakness or disease should subject himself to conditions which would not injuriously affect persons in ordinary health, but would be dangerous to him, and injury result, it would not be due to an accidental cause. For example, if a person having a diseased heart should take violent exercise voluntarily, and death should result, the cause would not be accidental. Southard v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 34 Conn. 574. See also Bacon v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L. R. A. 617; Sinclair v. Maritime Pass. Assur. Co. 3 El. & El. 478. Although a result may not be designed, foreseen, or expected, yet, if it be the natural and direct effect of acts voluntarily done, or of conditions voluntarily assumed, it cannot be said to be accidental.

We do not think the cases relied upon by the appellant hold a contrary rule. In Hamlyn v. Crown Accidental Ins. Co. [1893] 1 Q. B. 750, it appears that a person sustained an injury to his knee in attempting to catch a rolling marble; but it was found that the injury resulted from an unnatural position or movement of the leg, which was not intended by the person injured. The injury considered in North American Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43, 8 Am. Rep. 212, was caused by the unintended slipping of a pitchfork in the hands of the person injured, in such a manner that it struck him in the bowels, and caused the injury. The case of Burkhard v. Travellers' Ins. Co. 102 Pa. 262, 48 Am. Rep. 205, involved the act of a person injured in stepping into a hole in a bridge, of which he had no knowledge. And in the case of Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Rep. 157, it appears that the person insured, in attempting to get upon a moving train, fell under the cars and was killed; but it was not claimed that his fall was the result of his doing what he intended to do.

The certificate in suit made the defendant liable if the death of Feder resulted from an accidental cause. The evidence shows that the cause was the ruptured artery; but that was not accidental, if it was the natural result of an act voluntarily done by Feder. That he did anything but what he intended to do, in attempting to close the shutters, is not shown nor claimed. It is not even shown that he made any unusual exertion in what he did. Had the artery been ruptured while the decedent was sitting quietly in his chair, or while walking at a moderate pace, there would be no ground for claiming that the rupture was accidental; and we do not think that, because the act of closing the shutters may have required a little more exertion than would have been required to remain seated or to walk leisurely, the rupture was accidental. So far as is shown, it may have been, and probably was, due to a weakened or diseased condition of the artery. But, however that was, we are satisfied that there was no evidence which would have authorized the jury to find that the rupture was accidental, within the meaning of the certificate.

We conclude that the district court was right in directing a verdict for the defendant, and the judgment rendered is therefore affirmed.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The right of a receiver appointed in another state to maintain an action is not absolute but rests in the discretion of the court.
2. A receiver of a corporation appointed in another state should not be allowed by an exercise of comity to sue for the enforcement of the liability of stockholders, when it would be in contravention of the rights of the citizens of the state and operate to their injury.
3. An order of appointment of a receiver which gives him authority to bring suits in other states is without efficiency to create such right without sanction in the states where the suits are brought.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Pottawattamie County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce the liability of stockholders in an insolvent corporation. Affirmed.

Statement by Granger, J.:

As a statement of facts, we have taken the following substantially from those made by counsel: This was an action brought by Albert U. Wyman, the receiver of the Nebraska Fire Insurance Company, to enforce against the several defendants their constitutional liability under the Nebraska statute for their unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the company. This company was incorporated on March 13, 1883, in conformity with the laws of the state of Nebraska, under the name of the Nebraska & Iowa Insurance Company, its name being subsequently, on February 28, 1890, changed to the Nebraska Fire Insurance Company, under which name it transacted business until its insolvency, in 1891, when an application for its dissolution by W. G. Madden, one of its stockholders, resulted in the appointment of the plaintiff, first as temporary, and then as permanent, receiver of the corporation, and a decree adjudging the dissolution thereof. The testimony shows that one J. T. Hart, of Council Bluffs, was largely instrumental in the organization of the company; that the subscribers to its stock and the original stockholders were citizens prominent in Omaha and in Council Bluffs; and that when this company, the Nebraska & Iowa Insurance Company, was organized, there was organized at the same time, mainly through the instrumentality of Mr. Hart, another insurance company, called the Iowa & Nebraska Insurance Company, and having its principal place of business at Council Bluffs, Iowa. The original intention of the organizers, as gathered from the testimony of Mr. Hart, and the contract of subscription, was to consolidate the two companies after their organization. This, however, was never done, the two corporations being operated separately in each state, although the stockholders were at first the same. The Iowa corporation did business until about May 29, 1885, when it was merged into a company known as the Western Home of Sioux City, and went into the hands of a receiver. The capital of each company was $100,000, and the certificates of stock contemplated subscriptions to both companies, and were signed, as appears, by officers of each company. The stock was originally issued in this duplicate or combined form. These combined certificates were subsequently canceled, and were separately rewritten and issued. The contract of subscriptions of the several defendants to the stock of the two companies, and upon which it is claimed that the defendants herein are answerable for the unpaid 50 per cent thereof, is as follows: "We, the undersigned subscribers hereto, in consideration of each other's subscription to the capital stock for an insurance company in the state of Iowa and the state of Nebraska, to be organized in both states separately, and after the organization to be consolidated, to be known as the Iowa & Nebraska State Insurance Company, for the purpose of carrying fire and lightning, windstorm and tornado, insurance, business to be done under the laws of both states, do hereby subscribe and agree to pay and secure as provided by the laws of said states the several sums set opposite our respective names, if such an insurance organization is perfected, and on demand, to the secretary thereof, on or before the 12th day of March, 1883." Under this subscription, shares of stock of $100 each were issued to the subscribing stockholders, one half of such shares being issued to them in the Iowa company, and one half in the Nebraska company. The defendants paid 50 per cent of their several subscriptions upon the stock of the Nebraska & Iowa Insurance Company at the time of its organization, as required by the laws of the state of Nebraska. Nothing more was ever paid upon the stock except in the manner indicated hereafter. The defendants in this action, who had been subscribers to the capital stock of the consolidated company, and to whom had been issued the joint certificates of stock in the Iowa and Nebraska companies, had surrendered their stock, and new stock had been issued to the parties purchasing from them. These purchasers, as the record shows, were in large part the original promoters of the company. Upon the organization of the company, one half of the capital stock subscribed being paid in cash, the promissory notes of the subscribers, payable on demand and secured, were given in payment of the other one half of the stock of the corporation. Prior to 1887, these defendants had transferred the stock issued to them, by a surrender of their stock, and reissuance of other certificates to the purchasers; the company accepting the surrender and recognizing the transfer, returning the stock notes of the defendants, and accepting the stock notes of the transferee in lieu thereof. This was done, as shown by the record, at a time when the corporation was solvent, and the transfers were made and new stock issued to solvent purchasers; all being done in good faith on the part of the corporation, the transferrer, and the transferees. Practically, the entire stock passed into the hands of a syndicate composed in large part of original promoters of the consolidated corporation, but not including any of these defendants. From the date of these transfers, these defendants ceased to have any connection with or control over the corporation. The district court entered judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. E. Wakeley, A. C. Wakeley, and Flickinger Bros., for appellant:

We do not understand that Iowa has denied the principle of comity in a proper case.

The liability here sought to be enforced is not penal, but purely contractual, and because contractual (even if a statutory liability) will be enforced in a foreign state.

The liability here sought to be enforced is not a liability for the debts of, but a liability to, the corporation.

The liability being a contract one, and its enforcement not being immoral or opposed to the public policy of Iowa, or to abstract justice, this court will, on the principles of comity, entertain the action, grant the relief prayed for, and in construing the constitutional provision adopt that construction given it by the highest court of this state.

Granger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It will be well to repeat that this action is by a receiver appointed to wind up the affairs of the Nebraska Fire Insurance Company, on the application of one of its stockholders, to recover from the defendants on their subscriptions to the original enterprise, wherein was contemplated the organization of two companies,—one in Nebraska, to be known as the Nebraska & Iowa Insurance Company, and one in Iowa, to be known as the Iowa & Nebraska Insurance Company; the two companies to be thereafter consolidated. The first-named company was organized under the laws of Nebraska, and located at the city of Omaha, in that state; and the latter under the laws of Iowa, and located at the city of Council Bluffs, in Iowa. The consolidation was never made, and the latter company was changed to that of the Western Home of Sioux City, and its place of business changed to Sioux City, Iowa, about May, 1885. The Nebraska & Iowa Company was changed to the Nebraska Fire Insurance Company, and continued to operate until 1891, when the insurance department of Nebraska withdrew its certificates authorizing the company to do business, and, on the application of one of its stockholders, its insolvency was decreed; and the plaintiff is now engaged in winding up its affairs, and this action is in aid of that purpose.

The action has for a legal basis a provision of the Constitution of Nebraska, as follows (§ 4, art. 11): "Liabilities of Subscribers to Stock. In all cases of claims against corporations and joint-stock associations, the exact amount justly due shall be first ascertained, and after the corporate property shall have been exhausted, the original subscribers thereof shall be individually liable to the extent of their unpaid subscriptions, and the liability for the unpaid subscriptions shall follow the stock." Dismissing for the moment the effect of an arbitrary legal liability, which must be respected and enforced when known, there is not, in view of the entire record in this case, an equitable consideration favorable to a recovery against these defendants. The present liabilities of the Nebraska corporation cannot truthfully be said to have accrued in consequence of, or with reliance upon, the former connection of these defendants with the enterprise from which sprang the present company. These facts are important as aiding in the solution of a legal proposition, urged by appellees, to the effect that this action cannot be maintained in Iowa, because it is brought by a receiver of a Nebraska corporation to enforce a provision of the law of that state; the claim being that such a proceeding can only be had as a result of comity between the states, and that the basis of such an exercise is that the citizens of the state granting it shall not be thereby prejudiced or injured. Admitting, for the sake of argument, the rule that comity controls as to the authority of plaintiff to sue in this state, and, as we have in effect said, the record leaves us without doubt that its exercise should be denied, because it would be in contravention of the rights of our citizens, and operate to their injury.

Upon the question of the absolute right of plaintiff to sue in this state, we are not without precedent in our own decisions; and while, in announcing a rule, we have recognized the fact of a conflict of authority, we are not persuaded by the argument in this case that a change should be made, or the rule modified. Stress is given in argument to the fact that the order of appointment in Nebraska gives to the receiver authority to bring suits in other states. That authority is valuable as an aid to secure the right to do so in the state where the privilege is sought, and is judiciously granted; but it is without efficiency to create such a right independent of sanction within the state. The case of Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 322, 15 L. ed. 164, contains a somewhat exhaustive consideration of the question of the right of a receiver appointed in one state to bring a suit for the possession of property in another state, and it is there said: "He has no extraterritorial power of official action; none which the court appointing him can confer, with authority to enable him to go into a foreign jurisdiction to take possession of the debtor's property; none which can give him, upon the principle of comity, a privilege to sue in a foreign court or another jurisdiction, as the judgment creditor himself might have done, where his debtor may be amenable to the tribunal which the creditor may seek." An underlying thought of the rule seems to be that, within the jurisdiction of one's appointment as receiver, he is amenable in his official capacity to the courts, and he may exercise his authority under the law of the jurisdiction; while, in a foreign jurisdiction, the law does no more than to make the person entertaining it amenable to its laws, and in no way recognizes the official capacity. As a citizen in a jurisdiction foreign to his residence, he has a legal status, and is amenable to, and may invoke the protection of, the law. As an officer of a court from a foreign jurisdiction, he has, and is entitled to, no legal recognition, except as the courts may, in their discretion, grant it, because he is without the official obligation that he assumed in his own jurisdiction, and which is essential to a proper and safe exercise of such power. In Ayres v. Siebel, 82 Iowa, 347, we denied the right of a trustee, appointed by the court in Indiana, to sue and recover on a contract in this state; and in Parker v. C. Lamb & Sons, 99 Iowa, 265, 34 L. R. A. 704, we denied such a right to a receiver, and cited the Ayres-Siebel Case. In Parker v. C. Lamb & Sons, we quoted approvingly from High, Receivers, § 239, as follows: "Upon the question of the territorial extent of a receiver's jurisdiction and powers for the purpose of instituting actions connected with his receivership, the prevailing doctrine established by the Supreme Court of the United States, and sustained by the weight of authority in various states, is that the receiver has no extraterritorial jurisdiction or power of official action, and, cannot, as a matter of right, go into a foreign state or jurisdiction and there institute a suit for the recovery of demands due the person or estate subject to his receivership. His functions and powers, for the purpose of litigation, are held to be limited to the courts of the state within which he was appointed; and the principles of comity between nations and states which recognize the judicial decisions of one tribunal as conclusive in another do not apply to such a case, and will not warrant a receiver in bringing an action in a foreign court or jurisdiction." These authorities are broad and conclusive, and, unless we are to set them aside, are conclusive of this case. Counsel have shown great zeal and tact in presenting authorities more or less in point, and we acknowledge somewhat of a conflict, as we have done in other cases; but the weight of authority we regard as in line with our holdings, and we are not disposed to disturb them. Beach on Receivers (§ 683) states the same rule, and cites Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 322, 15 L. ed. 164, from which we have quoted, and then says: "The rule thus laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States has been followed by other courts with essential unanimity, and can hardly be said to be seriously questioned." In Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald & M. Constr. Co. 41 Neb. 374, these authorities are approvingly cited and applied.

It remains for us to state as a conclusion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in the courts of Iowa, and the judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Charles H. GIBSON, Appt.,

v.

George T. WOOD.

(.....Ky.....)

Previous residence in territory annexed to a city is to be deemed residence within the city for the purpose of computing the period of residence necessary to make a person eligible to a city office.

(February 21, 1899.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from taking or holding the office of commissioner of the sinking fund of the city of Louisville on the ground that he was ineligible to such office. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Helm & Bruce for appellant.

Messrs. John W. Barr, Jr., and Humphrey & Davis for appellee.

Hazellrigg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The opinion of the chancellor so fully covers the law and the facts of this case that we adopt it as our opinion. It is as follows:

"In October, 1893, the plaintiff, Charles H. Gibson, was elected commissioner of the sinking fund of the city of Louisville for a term of three years, and until his successor shall have qualified. The plaintiff entered upon the duties of his office, and became president of said board. On October 15, 1896, the general council of the city of Louisville, duly assembled in joint session for the purpose, elected the defendant, George T. Wood, to succeed the plaintiff, Charles H. Gibson; casting eight votes for the plaintiff, three votes for J. M. McKnight, and twenty-five votes for the defendant. A proper certificate of election has been delivered to the defendant. He has given bond, and taken the oath of office, as required by law, and his bond has been approved by the general council. This action was begun November 9, 1896, for the purpose of enjoining and restraining the defendant from taking or holding the office of commissioner of the sinking fund of the city of Louisville, or from in any manner interfering with the plaintiff in the discharge of his duties as such commissioner. A temporary restraining order was entered in accordance with the prayer of the petition. The case is now before the court upon an application for a preliminary injunction, as prayed for in the petition.

"It is claimed that defendant, Wood, was not at the time of his election, and is not now, eligible to hold the office of sinking fund commissioner of the city of Louisville by reason of his residence only. Section 261 of the city charter provides: 'No person shall be eligible to any office who is not at the time of his election a qualified voter of the city, and who has not resided therein three years preceding his election.' The evidence shows that the defendant, Wood, was born in the city of Louisville on December 26, 1855; that from his birth until the 10th day of July, 1893, he resided at No. 946 Third street, in the city of Louisville; that on July 10, 1893, he moved, with his family, to his present residence, on the northwest corner of East Broadway and Longest avenue, then in the town of Enterprise, a suburb of the city of Louisville, and about two squares east of the city boundary as fixed in 1869; and that he has continuously lived in his new home since July 10, 1893. In August, 1896, the town of Enterprise was annexed to, and became a part of, the city of Louisville, and is now designated as the thirty-fifth precinct of the first ward of said city. At the election held on November 3, 1896, the defendant, Wood, voted at said precinct. It appears that, while defendant had resided in his present home more than three years before his election in October, 1896, the territory upon which his residence is located had been a constituent part of the city of Louisville only about two months at the time of his election.

"In considering the eligibility of the defendant, therefore, are we to give him the benefit of his period of residence from the time he moved to his new home, in August, 1893, when it was located in the town of Enterprise, or shall he be restricted to the time that his home has been incorporated in the present limits of the city of Louisville? The question may be simply put as follows: When the territory occupied by the defendant's residence was incorporated into the city of Louisville, did he then acquire all the rights of a resident of the city of Louisville, and is he entitled to consider the period of his residence in Enterprise in determining his eligibility to this office? The industry of counsel has failed to produce any authority directly in point. Many instances, more or less analogous, have been used in illustration. The organization of the state of Kentucky is cited as bearing upon this question. Prior to February, 1791, the territory composing the present state of Kentucky was known as the 'District of Kentucky.' The first Constitution, adopted in April, 1792, provided that representatives should be chosen on the first Tuesday in May following, and that no person should be eligible to that office who had not been a resident of the state or Kentucky for two years next preceding his election. The same provisions applied to the electors, except the period of their residence was raised to three years before the election. While the district was admitted into the Union as a state in February, 1791, and the election was held in May, 1792, when the state of Kentucky had been in existence as a state less than two years, still persons were considered eligible whose continuous residence in the district and in the state of Kentucky covered the constitutional period of eligibility. Strictly speaking, no person had resided in the state of Kentucky a period of two years, for the state had not existed as a state for that length of time, but people who had lived two years upon the territory which had been erected into the state of Kentucky were deemed eligible as representatives, within the meaning of our first Constitution. Likewise, § 114 of the present Constitution of Kentucky provides that no person shall be eligible as judge of the court of appeals who has not resided in the district in which he is elected two years next preceding his election. The act creating seven districts for the several judges of the court of appeals was passed in June, 1893, and Jefferson county was made a separate district, known as the 'Fourth Appellate District.' It was further provided that the judge of the fourth appellate district should be elected in 1894. If we apply the strict letter of the law, which requires a residence of two years in his district, then no one in this district was eligible for the office of judge of the court of appeals, for the district was not two years old. No one, however, has for a moment questioned the correctness of the practical construction given in that instance. Again, the Federal Constitution provides that no person, except a natural-born citizen or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, should be eligible to the office of president. Texas was admitted into the Union in 1845. Can it be claimed that a person born in the republic of Texas prior to its admission into the Union is ineligible to the presidency of the United States for that reason? We do not believe such a construction can be reasonably contended for.

"An interesting case arose in Ohio. In 1867 the state of Ohio ceded to the Federal government a tract of land in Montgomery county, Ohio, to be used as a soldiers' home. As was usual in such cases, the state relinquished all jurisdiction and control over said tract of land, reserving only the right to serve process, in order that the home might not become an asylum for evildoers. The Federal government built its soldiers' home, and continued its jurisdiction thereof for about four years, during which time this territory was as distinct from the state of Ohio as the District of Columbia is distinct from the state of Maryland. At the October election, in 1869, certain inmates of this soldiers' home voted for candidates for clerk of the court of common pleas of Montgomery county. In the contested election case of Sinks v. Reese, 19 Ohio St. 306, 2 Am. Rep. 397, it was held by the supreme court of Ohio that these inmates of the soldiers' home were not residents of the state of Ohio, and therefore were not entitled to vote. In the spring of 1871 the Federal government ceded the property back to the state of Ohio, although no affirmative action was ever taken by the state towards accepting the territory so ceded back to it. At the October election of the same year (1871) certain inmates of the home again voted for candidates for the office of coroner of Montgomery county. The laws of Ohio required a residence of one year in the state prior to the election as a prerequisite to the right to vote. In the contested election case of Renner v. Bennett, 21 Ohio St. 431, the question was presented as to whether these inmates were entitled to vote at the October election in 1871. The supreme court of Ohio had already decided in the case of Sinks v. Reese, 19 Ohio St. 306, 2 Am. Rep. 397, that from 1867 to the spring of 1871 these inmates of the soldiers' home were not residents of the state of Ohio, and had no right to vote in state elections. When the territory was ceded back to the state of Ohio, in the spring of 1871, these inmates of the soldiers' home immediately became residents of the state of Ohio, but had not been residents for the period of one year prior to the election in 1871. The question was therefore squarely presented whether, in considering the eligibility of these inmates of this soldiers' home to the right to vote in the state election, the court should take into consideration the time they had resided in this same spot while it was under the jurisdiction of the Federal government, and was not a part of the political government of the state of Ohio. The court held that the time should be counted, and in the course of the opinion used this language, viz.: 'These one hundred and five inmates of the asylum were therefore residents and citizens of Ohio at the time of the election. Were they residents of the "state" for the full year, within the meaning of the Constitution of Ohio? We think they were. In one sense, the state is a territory; in another sense, it is a political organization. These inmates have resided for the whole year in the same place. Territorially, they, and the asylum in which they reside, have been all the time in the state. Politically, or, if I may so speak, jurisdictionally, both have been temporarily out of the state. The expression is used in both senses. It is used in a territorial sense in the agreed statement filed in the case. In favor of the right of suffrage, we think it safe and proper to give it that meaning in the Constitution. In the primary and popular sense, the asylum is, and always has been, in Ohio. It has never ceased to be a part of the state of Ohio geographically, although the state jurisdiction over it has been temporarily suspended. Suppose a township or a part of a township of one county temporarily attached to another county and reattached to the first; would the legal voters after each change have to begin de novo their twenty days' residence in the township and their thirty days' residence in the county? I think not. And yet the cases are supposed to be identical in principle with the one at hand. Both rest on the same provision of the Constitution, requiring a prescribed length of residence in the state, county, and township. If there is any difference between the principle involved in the two cases, it is in this: that while in the cases supposed the change of jurisdiction is in fact temporary, in the present case it was necessarily temporary; the jurisdiction having been granted for a temporary purpose, the reversion always remaining in the state. It seems to us it is sufficient that the voter, at the time of the election, has a "residence," in the political and jurisdictional sense of the term, within the proper political division, and has resided in the same place for the prescribed length of time, to fulfil this requirement of the Constitution. In such a case it is true, in the primary sense of the words, that there is no change of residence, but merely a change of jurisdiction. To say that there is a change of residence is to give the words a secondary meaning.

"In the case at bar the defendant, Wood, has done no act by which he should lose any of his political rights, either as a resident of the town of Enterprise or as a resident of the city of Louisville. The city of Louisville has seen fit to incorporate the town of Enterprise, and make it a part of the city of Louisville. In my opinion, when the city of Louisville annexed the town of Enterprise, it adopted the conditions then existing in the town of Enterprise, as to residence and citizenship, as a part of the city government, and former citizens of the town of Enterprise, who thus became citizens of the city of Louisville, were entitled to all their rights, as former citizens of Enterprise, in determining their eligibility to office in the city of Louisville. When the defendant and his territory become parts of the city of Louisville, they are entitled to all the benefits that belong to all the other property and citizens of the city of Louisville. To hold otherwise would be to bring persons into the city of Louisville, and to burden them with city taxation and all the burdens of our city government, without granting them all the privileges which it had granted to its other residents. It would put the burden on all residents alike, but would give different rights to different classes of citizens, by distinguishing the old resident from the annexed resident. It follows that the defendant was eligible to the office to which he was elected, and the temporary injunction must be denied.

"Shackelford Miller,

"Special Judge."

It follows that the plaintiff's petition did not state a cause of action, and, a demurrer thereto having been sustained, the same was dismissed.

The judgment is affirmed.

v.

COMMONWEALTH of Kentucky for the Use of City of CATLETTSBURG.

(.....Ky.....)

An ordinance prohibiting any prostitute from being on the streets or alleys of a city between the hours of 7 o'clock P. M. and 4 o'clock A. M. without any reasonable necessity therefor is a valid exercise of the police power under a statute giving authority to "restrain and punish prostitutes."

(March 3, 1899.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Boyd County convicting them of violating a city ordinance against prostitutes being on the streets of the city during certain hours of the night. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dinkle & Montague for appellants.

Mr. John A. Burns, for appellee:

To convict under this ordinance the person must be of immoral or lewd character; she must be on the streets or alleys between the hours of 7 o'clock P. M. and 4 o'clock A. M. without a reasonable excuse for so being.

The appellants were proved to have been upon the streets without a reasonable excuse, and to have been women of lewd or immoral character.

Under the police power granted to municipalities this city has the right to enact such laws and ordinances as would inure to the good government and to the suppression of immorality and vice, and this ordinance is for no other purpose.

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 739, § 1.

Paynter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 3490, Ky. Stat., is part of the act for the government of cities of the fourth class, and as much of it as is pertinent to this inquiry reads as follows: "The board of council . . . shall have power within the city: (1) To pass ordinances not in conflict with the Constitution or laws of this state or of the United States. . . . (14) . . . To restrain and punish vagrants, prostitutes, rakes, and whoremongers." Conceiving it had the power, the board of council of the city of Catlettsburg passed an ordinance which reads as follows (§ 24): "Any prostitute being upon the streets or alleys of the city of Catlettsburg, Kentucky, between the hours of 7 o'clock P. M. and 4 o'clock A. M. following, standard time, except in instances of reasonable necessity, to be clearly shown by the party charged, shall be fined $5 for each offense." The appellants are prostitutes, and went upon the streets between the hours of 7 o'clock P. M. and 4 o'clock A. M., without any reasonable necessity therefor. For this offense a warrant was issued for their arrest, and the trial resulted in their conviction, and a fine of $5 was assessed against each of them. The circuit court sustained the action of the police judge imposing the fine. The question for review is whether the ordinance in question is valid.

A municipality is but an agency of the state, and, whenever it passes an ordinance in the exercise of police power, it is the instrumentality of the state, and does so for the state. The general assembly has vested the board of council of the municipality of Caudettburg with power to "restrain and punish prostitutes." The language used is broad and comprehensive enough to authorize the enactment of the ordinance under consideration. Did the general assembly have constitutional authority to vest the board of council with the power to enact the ordinance? Under our constitutional system, the ordinary police regulations have been left to the states. All that the Federal government can do is to see that the states do not, in attempting to exercise the police power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty, obstruct or impede the exercise of any authority which the Constitution has vested in the national government, or deprive a citizen of rights guaranteed to him by the Federal Constitution. It is difficult to define the police power of a state. In speaking of the police power of the states, Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (p. 704), says: "The police of a state, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its whole system of internal regulation, by which the state seeks, not only to preserve the public order, and to prevent offenses against the state, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others." Blackstone defines it to be "the due regulation and domestic order of the kingdom; whereby the individuals of the state, like members of a well-governed family, are bound to conform their general behavior to the rules of propriety, good neighborhood, and good manners, and to be decent, industrious, and inoffensive in their respective stations." 4 Bl. Com. *162. In speaking of the difficulty in defining the extent of police power, in Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079, it was said: "Many attempts have been made in this court and elsewhere to define the police power, but never with entire success. It is always easier to determine whether a particular case comes within the general scope of the power, than to give an abstract definition of the power itself which will be in all respects accurate."

Courts and law writers have found it difficult to define the extent and boundaries of the police power. It certainly extends to the protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens, and to the preservation of good order and public morals. Every citizen has the constitutional guaranty of life, liberty, and enjoyment of his property; and 43 L. R. A.

they cannot be taken from him, except by due process of law. Social and conventional rights, however, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as will prevent them from being dangerous and hurtful to the body politic; and the lawmaking department of the government, under the power vested in it by the Constitution, can enact laws providing for such reasonable restraints and regulations as may be necessary and expedient to secure social order and public morals. It is the duty of the state, direct or through such agencies as it may provide, to protect the public health and morals. It has the power by law to declare what shall constitute an offense, and provide a punishment for it within the constitutional limitations. It is certainly within the legislative power to provide for the restriction or suppression of bawdy houses. Our social institutions and public conscience demand that they shall be regulated or suppressed. The unfortunate beings who live in such houses, and pursue their occupation, live from their acts of immorality, which are a violation of social order, and tend to the destruction of public morals. The board of council of a municipality is presumably familiar with their habits and method in the prosecution of their work of shame and degradation. It was known to the board of council that these unfortunate women did nothing for a livelihood except to make merchandise of themselves. The favorite time for their business is between nightfall and the next day's dawn. Their conduct is calculated to bring together disorderly and ill-disposed persons, and likely to result in a breach of the public peace. Therefore the lawmaking department of the municipality declared that they should keep off of the streets and alleys of the city during the hours in which they could most successfully prosecute their immoral work. We think this is a reasonable restraint, and it does not unreasonably abridge their personal liberty. By the terms of the ordinance, they are allowed to go upon the streets if there is a reasonable necessity for it. During the fifteen hours of the twenty-four, these habitual offenders against the moral, social, and penal laws are permitted to go wherever they please upon the streets and alleys of the city, which affords them ample opportunity for healthful exercise, and of attending to their reasonable wants.

Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (p. 745), says: "It is sufficient for us to have pointed out that, in addition to the power to punish misdemeanors and felonies, the state has also the authority to make extensive and varied regulations as to the time, mode, and circumstances in and under which parties shall assert, enjoy, or exercise their rights, without coming in conflict with any of those constitutional principles which are established for the protection of private rights or private property." It has been held by courts that, under the police power, municipalities can regulate the height of buildings in cities, prescribe the streets upon which persons driving a certain class of vehicles shall travel, and prohibit them from traveling upon other streets, and regulate the hours at which public places, places of amusement, and saloons shall be closed. The legislatures of the states can enact laws to regulate the employment of children of certain ages, and prohibit women from engaging in certain kinds of employment. It has been held by some courts that a penalty can be imposed upon livery stable keepers for giving credit to pupils without the consent of the college authorities. It has been held, to protect laborers against oppression of their employers, that it is competent to forbid them being paid anything except legal-tender funds. Many illustrations of the exercise of police power, which has been sustained by the courts of the country could be given. These suggestions are merely to show the extent and comprehensiveness of the police power of the states, as interpreted by this and other courts of the country. Our attention has not been called to any case involving the exact question involved in this case. As cases arise in which the police power is attempted to be exercised, we must determine whether or not it has been constitutionally done. Our conclusion is that the legislature had vested the board of council with the power to pass the ordinance, and that, in doing so, it did not violate the Constitution of this state or that of the United States.

When the court had under consideration the case of Mender Furniture Co. v. Newport, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 829, its attention was not called to § 3519, Ky. Stat., which expressly gives this court jurisdiction of appeals from the judgments of circuit courts where fines of $20 or less are imposed under ordinances the validity of which is questioned. If the court's attention had been called to this section of the statute, it would not have taken the view of the question of the appellant's right to an appeal which it took.

KENTUCKY BOARD OF MANAGERS OF WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

(.....Ky.....)

A board of managers of the World's Columbian Exposition which is created by statute and the members of which are appointed by the governor as an agency of the state, although it is not expressly named as a corporation, but is expressly given power to make contracts and furnished with certain funds, while the state expressly declares that it will not be responsible for any indebtedness of the board, is at least a quasi corporation,

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract made by defendants with plaintiff for the furnishing of refreshments at the Kentucky building during the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. F. Buckner for appellant.

Messrs. Simrall, Bodley, & Doolan for appellee.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By an act approved January 19, 1893, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Collection and Exhibition of the Resources and Evidences of Progress of the State of Kentucky at the World's Columbian Exposition of One Thousand Eight Hundred and Ninety-three" (see Acts 1891-93, p. 433); the sum of $100,000, or so much of it as might be necessary, was appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for providing a suitable display of the state's progress, etc., at this exposition. To carry out the work contemplated by the act a board was created, to be known as "The Kentucky Board of Managers of the World's Columbian Exposition," to consist of five members, appointed by the governor. Each of the board was required to give bond, and enter at once upon the discharge of his duties. One of the board was to be elected president; another, secretary; and when the board was not in session the president might administer its affairs, subject to its approval. The board was given power to employ necessary agents and employees. It was required to have a suitable building erected for the Kentucky headquarters, and this building, it was provided, "should contain the necessary restaurant and refreshment accommodations, the same to be let to the highest and best bidder, and the proceeds covered into the treasury of the Kentucky board of managers." The act did not contemplate the withdrawal of the $100,000 by the board from the treasury, except as it was needed to cover its expenditures, but it at once drew out the whole sum. After this had been done, the general assembly, by a joint resolution, after reciting the fact that the total amount of the appropriation had been unnecessarily drawn, a considerable part of it remaining unexpended, declared "that the public and all persons interested may have full knowledge in the premises, that the state will not assume the payment or pay any expenses, charges, arrears, or indebtedness, if any, whatsoever that may remain unpaid after the expenditure of the appropriation heretofore made." See Acts 1891-93, p. 1568. The board, in order to provide the necessary restaurant and refreshment accommodations, contracted with appellant to carry on the restaurant at the headquarters building, he agreeing to pay it 10 per cent of the gross receipts. On November 7, 1893, appellant filed this suit against the board, praying judgment against it for $5,000 for failing to comply with the contract it made with him, in various particulars set out in his petition. The board filed a demurrer to the petition, which the court below sustained, on the ground that it was only the agent of the state of Kentucky, and so could not be sued. This is the only question raised on this appeal.

The rule is well settled that the state cannot be sued, and that the same protection is extended to the officers of the state. But this rule does not apply to a corporation created by the state for certain public purposes. If appellee was made by the acts referred to a corporation or a quasi corporation, we see no reason why it should be exempted from the rule allowing suits to be brought against corporations on contracts they have made. So the question is presented whether appellee was invested by the legislature with the character of a corporation or quasi corporation. It is not necessary that the thing created by the legislature should be named by it a corporation. Its character depends upon the powers given it, and not upon the name by which the legislature may call it. Following a decision of this court the Supreme Court of the United States, in Hancock v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 145 U. S. 409, 36 L. ed. 755, said: "By the act of 1869 this prescribed portion of Shelby county was authorized to issue bonds and subscribe stock. The bonds when issued were not the obligations of Shelby county, nor of the individual taxpayers, and still there must be some debtor. That debtor was this portion of Shelby county. Giving to it power to issue bonds and create indebtedness is the creation of an entity with power to act, and if this entity has power to create a debt, it becomes subject to suit. That this entity was not, in terms, named a corporation is not decisive. It is enough that an artificial entity was created, with power to exercise the functions of a corporation. It was, though not named, a corporate entity." In the case at bar the legislature, by the joint resolution above referred to, expressly declared that the state would not assume any debts of the board. If the state was not the debtor, it must have been contemplated that there was some entity on whom the obligation of these contracts would rest. It is true that the state cannot be sued for a debt, but the legislature may be petitioned to make an appropriation for the payment of the claim. The object of this joint resolution was to have it understood that the state was to be in no way responsible for the obligations of this board, and to forestall all claims, "whether legally enforceable, or merely obligatory in good morals and on the public faith," as stated in the resolution, and to cut off all applications for their payment by the legislature. But it cannot be presumed that it was contemplated that people who dealt with this board should have no one to look to for the enforcement of their just claims. The board was authorized to have a house built, and a restaurant run in it, to employ agents and assistants, and to take all necessary steps to have the state properly represented at that exposition. The commissioners clearly were not personally responsible for their obligations, the state expressly declared that it was not to be responsible, and the only reasonable conclusion is that the board of managers to whom the $100,000 was committed to carry out the objects of the act was intended to be, to the extent of the funds put in its hands, at least a quasi corporation; and, as the power to make contracts is expressly conferred, the power to sue or be sued on these contracts was necessarily vested in the board, for the contracts were the obligations of the board, and not the obligations of the state. It is true that this board has been called, in an opinion by this court, an "agency of the state." It was an agency of the state, but it was also vested with corporate powers, and in its corporate capacity it may be sued for its corporate acts, just as any other corporation. It appears from the petition that a large part of the $100,000 is unexpended, besides the proceeds of the restaurant received from appellant; and there is no reason why this money should not make good to appellant any loss that the board may have inflicted upon him by the breach of contract alleged in the petition. The board was not created to discharge any governmental function. The erection of a headquarters building and the running of a restaurant were matters of business, in which this board stood on the same plane as others engaged in like undertakings. In sending it to a distant state to carry on business, and absolving the state from all liability, the legislature must be presumed to intend that the funds in its hands should be subject to its obligations. In this respect the case at bar is totally different from Williamson v. Louisville Industrial School of Reform, 95 Ky. 251, 23 L. R. A. 200. There the state had established a charity, and the question was whether the fund on which it depended could be used to make good a tort of an attendant, and the charity in this way impaired or destroyed. The decision is rested on the ground that the trust fund could not be diverted from the use to which the legislature had devoted it. But here the trust has been performed, and a surplus left. The fund was devoted by the legislature to the carrying out of this business, and there will be no diversion of it, if applied to the payment of the claims arising out of the business which are justly due.

We have examined the World's Fair cases in other states cited by counsel. The point raised here was not involved in these or the other cases relied on for appellee.

The judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Paynter, J., dissenting (Filed February 15, 1899):

The court recognizes as elementary the principle that a state can be sued only when she has expressly given her consent. Notwithstanding the recognition of that principle, the court distinctly and manifestly disregards it. The fundamental error consists in assuming that, as the board of managers could make a contract with reference to the business which the act commissioned it to transact, therefore it was intended that the board, and not the state, should be bound thereby. Because the law authorizes the agents or officers of a state to make contracts for her, it does not follow that an action can be maintained against a state thereon. It is equally as erroneous to assume that, because the state cannot be sued, therefore her agents can be on her contracts. If the test of a right to sue a state was to be determined by the fact that her agents had made a contract authorized by law, then she could be sued on her contract thus made, as an individual can be on his obligations. To show that the court proceeded upon an erroneous hypothesis, and that its reasoning is not sound, it is but necessary to quote its language, which is as follows: "As the power to make contracts is expressly conferred, the power to sue or be sued on these contracts was necessarily vested in the board, for the contracts were the obligations of the board, and not the obligations of the state." The exhibit which the board was required to make under the act was for the state of Kentucky. The money with which the expenses of the exhibit and commission were to be paid belonged to the state, and the commissioners appointed to carry out the wishes of the state were officers and agents, and were required to give bond to the state for the faithful discharge of their duties. They were required to make reports to the governor of the state for his examination and supervision. In fact everything they were required to do under the act was for the state, and every dollar which they were authorized to expend belonged to the state. There was nothing in the duties of the board which indicated that it was incorporated or that it was to transact the business as an incorporated company. The members of the commission were simply the agents of the state, and carried on the business in the name designated by the act which made the appropriation. The act provides that "any excess of the state appropriation and the proceeds of the sales of such building materials, or any other property that may be proper to sell, shall be covered into the treasury and held and treated as part of the general fund of the state. This language shows that the commissioners were not to have a cent's interest in the fund which was appropriated, except their salaries and expenses, or that part which might remain after the World's Fair was over. The board was not to withdraw from the treasury any of it, except upon warrants drawn by the auditor of public accounts on the state treasurer, but in some way it got possession of the entire fund. Then it was that the legislature made the declaration that it would not be bound beyond the amount appropriated. If the general assembly had declared in the act that it was to be bound for all contracts which the commissioners made, that would not have given a right to one who entered into a contract with the commission to sue the state thereon, as the consent to be sued was not given. If the resolution to which the court called attention is to be given any significance in this case, it certainly has exactly the opposite meaning to the one given it by the court, as the inference to be drawn is that she was to be bound by contracts to the extent of the amount of the appropriation, to wit, $100,000, but not beyond that amount. This would mean, if anything, that these were the state's, not the commissioner's contracts, to that extent. There is nothing in the language of the resolution which indicates that the legislature did or intended to relinquish its right to the fund. The resolution does not in the slightest degree tend to support the conclusion reached by the court. In Norman v. Kentucky Bd. of Mgrs. of World's Columbian Exposition, 93 Ky. 543, 18 L. R. A. 556, in speaking of the relation which the commissioners sustained to the state, the court said: "The commissioners selected to expend the money are merely the state's agents to do so and provide the exhibit for the benefit of its people." It necessarily follows that the contracts which the commissioners were authorized to enter into obligated the state, and not the board. If they were a corporation under the name of the board of managers, etc., it was none the less an agency of the state, without right to sue or be sued. There was no such right conferred by the act. There is no language employed in the act, and nothing in the nature of its duties, which indicates that the legislature intended to create the board a corporation.

The case of Hancock v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 145 U. S. 409, 36 L. ed. 755, does not sustain the court's conclusion that the board is a corporation. In that case certain persons were directed to do certain things, in the way of issuing bonds of a taxing district to a railroad company. Under the act the district became a stockholder of the railroad company, and the question arose as to the right of the district to vote its stock. The court held that under the act under which the bonds of the district were authorized to be issued to the railroad company, and its stock issued to the district, the district was created a corporation, although not designated so by the terms of the act. If such a question could and did arise in this case, as to whether the state had been created a corporation by the act under which the commission was created, then the doctrine of that case would be applicable. The county judge and others who acted for the taxing district in the Hancock Case were not declared a corporation, but the district itself was adjudged to be a corporation; so there is not the slightest analogy between that and the case under consideration. The right of Herr to sue the Kentucky Central Lunatic Asylum (97 Ky.

458, 28 L. R. A. 394) was adjudged because the charter expressly permitted it "to sue and be sued." It was said in Tate v. Salmon, 79 Ky. 543: "It has been repeatedly decided by this court that, in the absence of a law authorizing it, the state cannot be made a party defendant or garnishee, and is not suable in her own courts; that parties will not be allowed to invade this inhibition by ignoring the state in their suits, and proceeding directly against the public officer having the custody of the moneys sought to be reached." In the case of Williamson v. Louisville Industrial School of Reform, 95 Ky. 251, 23 L. R. A. 200, it appeared that it was a chartered corporation, with the usual powers to sue and be sued; and it was held to be an agency of the state, and for that reason it was held that it could not be sued.

The untenable position is assumed by the court, that, although you cannot sue the state without her consent, you can sue her agents without her consent, and appropriate money in their hands to the payment of the alleged claim against the state. If this were true, the doctrine that a state cannot be sued would become obsolete, because parties would sue the agents, and not the principal. The board is said to be a corporation distinct from the state, bound for its obligations; yet its officers are the salaried officers of the state, make reports to the state of their acts, hold the funds of the state, and are commanded to cover the unexpended portion into the treasury of the state. The action is, to all intents and purposes, one against the state. It is the state's property, and not that of the commissioners, that is to be affected by the judgment. It is the right of the state that is assailed. It is true, the attack is not made against the state directly but through her officers. To proceed in this way is just as objectionable as if the action had been instituted directly against the state. Whoever deals with a sovereign state is aware that he must rely entirely upon the sense of justice and good faith of the state, and that her courts cannot interfere to enforce contracts, except wherein she has given her consent.

Many authorities could be cited to sustain the conclusion reached in this dissenting opinion, but it is deemed unnecessary to do so.

v.

TACOMA TRACTION COMPANY, Appt.

(15 Wash. 660.)

1. Evidence as to trouble which plaintiff had about the payment of fare on a railroad train is not admissible in an action to recover damages for alleged wrongful ejection from a street car.
2. Positive testimony by a street-car conductor that one suing for wrongful ejection from a car had not paid his fare cannot be bolstered up by asking him upon his examination in chief the reason which led him to that conclusion.

3. The measure of damages for wrongful ejection from a street car is not limited to the price of a ticket for another fare which plaintiff had in his possession and might have used, where the conductor, instead of ascertaining definitely whether or not plaintiff had paid his fare, which might have been done by a few moments' investigation, charged him with attempting to beat the company, and thus placed him in a position where the use of another ticket would be an apparent admission of the charge.

I. Summary.

There is some conflict of authority as to the duty of a passenger having money to pay the fare demanded or leave the train when he is entitled to transportation. The following cases hold that it is not the duty of a passenger to pay fare wrongfully demanded, but that he may stand upon his rights: SPRENGER v. TACOMA TRACTION COMPANY; *Head v. Georgia P. R. A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful ejection from defendant's car. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Doolittle & Fogg, for appellant:

If an issue of fact be raised, whether a party has been guilty of an illegal and wrongful act, implying moral turpitude on the part of the accused, it is permissible to give in evidence such former act on his part as will show, or tend to show, his capacity, ability, or aptitude to do the thing complained of; that he has a dishonest disposition, or that his habit of rectitude and his moral sense are not sufficiently strong to preclude his doing a wrongful and immoral act of like kind and character with that with which he is charged.

Co.* 6 U. S. App. 298, 52 Fed. Rep. 197, 3 C. C. A. 23, 17 L. R. A. 800.

And the same was said to be the rule in Western Maryland R. Co. v. Stocksedale, 83 Md. 245.

It will be seen from the succeeding divisions that the cases which require a passenger to pay fare demanded when he has already paid it include some which involve questions of the passenger's own fault or negligence. It may also be suggested here that a distinction may be made between the right of a passenger to transportation without further payment of fare, upon demanding it in the proper way, and his right to ride upon a particular train without having provided himself with any evidence of his right to transportation which a conductor is entitled to recognize.

From the above cases it seems that in Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Washington, and Wisconsin, it is held not to be the duty of a passenger, if able, to pay fare unlawfully demanded, in order to avoid an expulsion, where he is already entitled to transportation; but that he may rest on his rights secured by his contract. But in Arkansas, Illinois, Maryland, Ohio, Oregon, and Tennessee, it seems that it is the duty of the passenger to pay the fare demanded or else leave the train. In Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, and New York, it seems to be held to be the duty of the passenger to pay if he is negligent in starting without taking every reasonable precaution to secure a proper ticket, or if he has notice of the infirmities of his ticket, or if he gets on a train without a transfer. The general rule in Texas is that the passenger need not pay fare twice to avoid being ejected, although there are exceptional cases. The Federal courts incline to hold that the passenger is required to pay fare illegally demanded or else leave the train. The rule imposing the duty of paying fare to avoid a wrongful expulsion is upheld on various grounds, e. g., the general duty of the plaintiff to avoid increasing his damages; that it will tend to avoid breaches of the peace; that "to the willing mind there is no injury"; and that a little matter of 5 cents or 10 cents, or $1.35 does not justify the passenger in asserting his rights.

Attention is called to New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Winter, 143 U. S. 60, 36 L. ed. 71, as being a leading case on the passenger's right, although it does not discuss the question of tendering fare to avoid expulsion. This case holds that a passenger entitled to ride has the right to resist being ejected; applying the principle that where a party does all that he is required to do under the terms of the contract into which he has entered, and is only prevented from reaping the benefit of such contract by the fault or wrongful act of the other party to it, the law gives him a remedy against the other party for such breach of contract.

This note is not intended to include cases which involve only the amount of resistance a passenger may make against an unlawful ejection; nor cases as to his right to recover for an unlawful ejection; but only such cases as discuss the duty of the passenger to pay fare demanded in order to avoid a wrongful expulsion and to cut down damages.

II. Where the failure to have a proper ticket is the fault of the ticket agent.

In some of the cases it is held that it is not the duty of the passenger to pay fare to avoid expulsion from the train where he has once paid for his ticket, and the ticket agent has made a mistake in regard to the same, so that the conductor refuses passage thereon.

said or did something of the same sort on a different occasion may be proved, to show the existence, on the occasion in question, of any intention, knowledge, good or bad faith, malice, or other state of mind, or of any state of body or bodily feeling, the existence of which is involved or is in issue, or is, or is deemed to be, relevant to that issue.

Where a passenger, at the direction of the selling agent, signs a return ticket twice, when it should have been signed only once, and offers to sign it again at the return point in the presence of the agent, who refuses to attest the same, he need not pay the fare twice. Head v. Georgia P. R. Co. 79 Ga. 358. In this case the court says that the passenger may recover for "all sorts of damage."

So, the passenger need not pay fare again where the agent at the return point refuses to attest a round-trip ticket. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Martino, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 634.

And where the ticket bears the wrong date the passenger need not pay twice to avoid expulsion. Ellsworth v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 95 Iowa, 98, 29 L. R. A. 173; Krueger v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 68 Minn. 445.

In the latter case a mileage ticket was dated to expire on the date of issue.

So, the refusal to pay fare to avoid a wrongful expulsion cannot be considered in mitigation of damages, where the agent assured the passenger when he sold an expired ticket that it was good. Callaway v. Mellett, 15 Ind. App. 386.

And a passenger need not pay fare again where a round-trip ticket does not give a reasonable time for the return trip, but expires before he can reach his starting point. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 90; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wright, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 468.

So, where a ticket is punched when sold, and the agent explains that it is a good ticket for the passenger, it is not his duty to pay fare to avoid expulsion. Murdock v. Boston & A. R. Co. 137 Mass. 298, 50 Am. Rep. 307.

In this case Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. 135 Mass. 407, 46 Am. Rep. 481, was distinguished, as there the face of the ticket showed the passenger that it was not good.

And a passenger need not pay fare demanded where a ticket is partly canceled and the agent assures the passenger that it is good. Hufford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 53 Mich. 118. In this case the court said: "We are all of opinion that if the plaintiff's ticket was apparently good, he had a right to refuse to leave the car." The court said that if the ticket was not good he should have paid his fare when it was demanded; but that the question whether the ticket was fair on its face was a question for the jury.

On a subsequent appeal of this case in 64 Mich. 631, the court in its opinion held: "On the undisputed facts in this case, I think the plaintiff was entitled to go to Walton Junction upon the ticket he presented to the conductor."

A passenger need not pay his fare again to avoid expulsion if the agent makes a mistake and gives him the wrong kind of a ticket.

As, where a second-class ticket is given to a passenger who pays for a first-class ticket. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Mackie, 71 Tex. 491, 1 L. R. A. 667. The court said in regard to the duty of a passenger to keep down damages by paying extra fare, that "the rule invoked by the appellant has been applied to many cases, and is wholesome in its operation in a case in which it is applicable; but we are of the opinion that it ought not to be applied in the case before us."

So, where an agent by mistake sells a ticket on a diverging line, the passenger has the right to stand upon his contract as made with the ticket agent. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Rather, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 72.

And where a ticket agent represents to a passenger that the ticket sold gives the right to go to L. in order to connect for another point, and he is ejected at a connecting point before reaching L., it is not his duty to pay the fare demanded. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Breckinridge, 99 Ky. 1.

Where a railroad company advertises excursion tickets and none are on sale, the payment of the fare by the passenger taking a receipt therefor and tendering the same to the same conductor returning, entitles the passenger to a ride, and he is not bound to pay the extra fare demanded in order to avoid unnecessary damages from expulsion. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Graham, 3 Ind. App. 28. In this case the court said that "if he had paid the extra demand, and been carried to his destination, perhaps he could only recover the excess, unless some element of special damages entered into the occurrence; but he is not bound to do this."

So, where the railroad company fails to have tickets to the place of destination on sale that are advertised, it is not the duty of the passenger to pay an improper demand of ten cents extra for not having a ticket in order to avoid unnecessary damages from expulsion. Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Rogers, 38 Ind. 116, 10 Am. Rep. 103.

And where the ticket office is not open for the sale of tickets, the railroad company cannot claim that it is the duty of the passenger to pay ten cents extra for failure to procure a ticket. Forsee v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 63 Miss. 66, 56 Am. Rep. 801; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Sparger (Tex. Civ. App.) 39 S. W. 1001.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dickerson, 4 Kan. App. 845, where it was contended that a passenger who was unable to buy a ticket because the office was not open could have escaped the humiliation and indignity by paying the excess, and then his measure of damages would be ten cents, and that he had no right to aggravate the damages by not complying with the demand of the conductor, it was said: "We are not partial to a rule that would require a person to submit to an extortion for the purpose of relieving

It was permissible to show, by the conductor, what was his usual course of business in taking up fares, his purpose and motive in so doing as he did, and what led him to stop at the third woman on the right-hand seat, in taking up fares, before crossing over to take up those on the left.

the extortioner from the natural consequences of his acts; but we need not consider that in this case." In this case the passenger did not have enough money to pay the ten cents extra.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dwelle, 44 Kan. 394, where it is held that if the railroad company fails to keep the office open, so that a ticket cannot be purchased, the passenger cannot be lawfully expelled for failure to pay excessive fare, it was said: "It is further urged that it is unreasonable to compel a conductor to institute an investigation as to the motives of a passenger, whether he is acting in good faith and under a mistaken belief that he was tendering all the fare that could be rightfully required of him; but his proper course when the collector insisted on the payment of the excess was to pay the fare demanded, and afterward, when opportunity is given for investigation, to apply for a refund or seek redress against the company." But on this question there was no decision.

In Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Mays, 4 Ind. App. 413, it was said: "If he has been unable to procure a ticket because of the fault of the railroad company in failing to afford him a proper opportunity to do so, he will be entitled to be carried at the ticket rate. He may pay, under protest, the excess demanded and afterward recover it back, but he is not obliged to do so; and if, insisting upon his right to be carried at the ticket rate, he be expelled, the company will be liable for its refusal to carry him."

But in the following cases it was held to be the duty of the passenger to pay the fare demanded and avoid expulsion, or to leave the train when requested, although the failure to have a proper ticket was the fault of the ticket agent:

Where the passenger was unable to get his ticket stamped. Mosher v. St. Louis, I. M. & T. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 326; Peabody v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 21 Or. 121, 12 L. R. A. 828.

In the latter case the court said that this rule will tend to avoid unseemly struggles on railroad trains, and prevent breaches of the peace, and protect the passenger by making the company responsible for all damages resulting from any breach of its contract.

And where the agent made a mistake as to the destination of the ticket, it was held that the passenger should pay the fare demanded or leave the train. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Grimm, 68 Ill. 499.

The court said that if the ticket agent causes the mistake by giving out a wrong ticket, "It is the duty of appellee to pay the fare demanded, and if the company refused to make suitable reparation for the indignity to which he 43 L. R. A.

has been exposed in being compelled to repay his fare, he could maintain an appropriate action."

And it was held that the passenger should pay the fare demanded to the next stopping place or leave the car, where the train did not stop at his point of destination. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Pierce, 47 Mich. 277. In this case the court said that the passenger was not in fault in starting upon that train, but that he could not complain of an indignity which it was his duty to avoid in occurring, and which it was his duty to expect in being removed from the train.

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Bannerman, 15 Ill. App. 100, where Mrs. E. B.'s husband bought for her a mileage ticket reading Mr. E. B., and she was ejected, the court in referring to the opinion in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Connell, 112 Ill. 295, 54 Am. Rep. 238, where the rule was laid down that the passenger should pay the fare demanded and sue for breach of the contract, or leave the train and sue for damages, said: "While the writer of this opinion finds it difficult to yield his assent to the doctrine of the Connell Case, it must nevertheless be accepted as of binding authority, coming as it does from the court of last resort."

And where a ticket agent made a mistake in regard to a return coupon, and the passenger applied to a person at the ticket office to have the mistake corrected, and was assured that it would be honored, it was held that his conduct in getting on the train after he knew there was a mistake was negligence, and if his right of action was a breach of the contract his damages were only nominal, if in tort he was entitled to recover no damages. Poulin v. Canadian P. R. Co. 6 U. S. App. 298, 52 Fed. Rep. 197, 3 C. C. A. 23, 17 L. R. A. 800.

This case makes a distinction between an action in tort and one on contract, and endeavors to apply the rule to an action on contract that it is the duty of the party damaged to use diligence to reduce the damages from a breach, and that the failure to do so prevents a recovery for any damages which might by due diligence have been avoided.

And in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hogue, 50 Kan. 40, where a passenger got off the train to buy a ticket to a further point and on failure to find the agent boarded the train and was forcibly ejected for refusing to pay an excessive fare, it was held that it was his duty to avoid that which he was bound to expect if he persisted in refusing to comply with the request of the conductor. In this case it was said that the lawfulness of the fare could have been settled as well without the expulsion as with it, that the plaintiff should have paid the ten cents demanded and brought his action, but he said to

One damned by reason of the accident, mistake, or tort of another is bound, no less in law than in morals, to make the scope of the injury as narrow, and the extent of the damage as small, as he conveniently, readily, and reasonably can. And the court's refusal to so instruct the jury, and his own voluntary instruction to the contrary, was wanting in authority of law.

Judge Thompson in 5 Southern Law Review, 831; Hordern v. Dalton, 1 Car. & P. 151; 2 Starkie, Ev. p. 741, title Nuisance; Cincinnati & C. Air Line R. Co. v. Rodgers, 24 Ind. 103; *Mather v. the conductor "I am here; if you want me off, you will have to put me off, for I will not get off."

And where a ticket agent sold a limited ticket as unlimited, and assured the passenger that he could be carried on the ticket at any time, it was held that the injury for an expulsion from the train for refusal to pay fare was not the fault of the conductor or the corporation, and it was not liable to the plaintiff: that the injury could have been prevented if the plaintiff had chosen to pay the fare demanded, and in that sense it was the result of his own negligence rather than of anything the conductor did. Hall v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 57.

In this case the distinction is made by the court between the right of a passenger with an expired ticket where he is not in fault, and a case of a man with a clear right and a clean ticket. And the court said that it was folly for the passenger to insist on the conductor taking his word about what he had been told by the station agent as to the capacity of a ticket stamped in plain terms as expired, rather than pay the fare demanded.

In Pullman Palace Car Co. v. McDonald, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 322, where a passenger presented his through ticket to the sleeping-car agent who sold him the through sleeping-car ticket, and the sleeping-car was detached and run on another road and his fare on that road demanded, it was held that it was reasonably within the contemplation of the parties, when the sleeping-car ticket was sold and the contract of carriage entered into, that the plaintiff would be subject to ejection from defendant's car for nonpayment of fare, if said car should not be transported to G. over the route called for. The court held that evidence on the part of plaintiff was admissible to show that he had no money to pay the extra fare demanded, saying: "A passenger will not be required to pay fare twice, or fare in excess of the proper fare, to prevent the damages resulting from a wrongful ejection by the carrier. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Mackie, 71 Tex. 491, 1 L. R. A. 667." In this case no additional fare was demanded by the defendant, and the ejection was made for the failure of the plaintiff to pay the railroad fare. The court said: "We think that under the circumstances it was the duty of the plaintiff to pay the railroad fare if he had the money, so as not to aggravate the damages, the rule being that he must use reasonable care to prevent the aggravation of damages."

In Western Maryland R. Co. v. Stocksedale, 83 Md. 245, it was said that when a passenger receives a wrong ticket from an agent of the company, by reason of the negligence or mistake of the agent, "the passenger should pay the fare demanded and seek his remedy by an 43 L. R. A.

action for the breach of the contract, and not by an action of tort for the ejection."

In Nelson v. Long Island R. Co. 7 Hun, 140, where a ticket agent stamped a ticket to eject on Monday, and the passenger claimed that it should have expired on Wednesday, and he was ejected, Brady, J., said: "It was not necessary, for example, for the plaintiff in this action to require the ceremony of stopping the train and of expulsion. It would have saved his rights, if, having refused to pay other than by his ticket, he was told that unless he paid he would be put out, and then paid under protest. If a passenger prefer the other course, then he must rely entirely upon the wrong done in putting him out, and upon the absence of any right of the company to eject him his remedy must depend."

And where the ticket agent by mistake issued a ticket for a shorter distance than paid for, the passenger could not maintain a suit counting only on the failure of the conductor to respect a correct ticket. Frederick v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. 37 Mich. 342, 26 Am. Rep. 531. In this case it was said: "An erroneous impression seems to prevail with many that where the conductor of a passenger train ejects therefrom a passenger who has paid his fare to a point beyond, but has lost or mislaid his ticket, or whose ticket does not entitle him to go farther, or upon that train, that the company is liable in an action at law for all damages which the party may in any way have sustained in consequence of the delay, mortification, injury to his health or otherwise, and that the passenger is under no obligation to prevent or lessen the damages by payment of the necessary additional fare to entitle him to complete his journey without interruption. Although such damages were claimed in this case, under our present view it will be unnecessary to discuss this question any farther at present."

III. Where another conductor is in fault.

There is some conflict of authority as to the duty of a passenger to pay the fare demanded to avoid an expulsion, where he pays transportation to one conductor without obtaining a transfer, or where the prior conductor detaches the wrong part of his ticket and a subsequent conductor demands fare. The weight of authority seems to impose on the passenger the duty of paying the second conductor and thus avoid expulsion, or else quietly leave the train when ordered and look to an action for breach of contract of carriage rather than to an action for a tortious expulsion. Some of the cases impose the duty on the passenger on the ground that no one can by force compel the performance of a contract. In the cases in this subdivision it may be said that the duty seems to be imposed where the passenger is negligent in starting on

v. Powell, 44 Mo. 439; Miller v. Roy, 10 La. Ann. 231; Dufort v. Abadie, 23 La. Ann. 280; Miller v. Mariner's Church, 7 Me. 51, 20 Am. Dec. 341; Davis v. Fish, 1 G. Greene, 407, 48 Am. Dec. 387; Loker v. Damon, 17 Pick. 284; Thompson v. Shattuck, 2 Met. 615; Milton v. Hudson River S. B. Co. 37 N. Y. 210.

A party cannot recover for the loss of his property, or for an injury to his person, where his own negligence has to any extent contriouted to the result.

Milton v. Hudson River S. B. Co. 37 N. Y. 212; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Breckinridge, 90 Ky. 1; Sandwich v. Dolan, 34 Ill. App. 205; Ford v. Illinois Refrigerating Constr.

another car without a sufficient ticket, although a recovery was finally had in Townsend v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Thomp. & C. 495, where the passenger knew the train did not go through and the conductor on the first train took his ticket to a point beyond without giving anything to show payment of fare. But some cases hold that it is not the duty of the passenger to pay the second conductor, as this will be a confession that he is trying to defraud the company.

So, where the wrong part of a round-trip ticket was taken up by one conductor, and the plaintiff ejected by another conductor, the court said that the charge of the conductor that the appellee was endeavoring to cheat the company was humiliating. "To pay fare in response to the conductor's demand was to confess that he was endeavoring to secure a ride by dishonest means, and almost any honest man would subject himself to expulsion before doing an act that would impliedly, if not expressly, fasten upon him the charge of falsehood and dishonesty, and there was no alternative; either the fare must be paid and the confession made, or the passenger must stand to his word and suffer expulsion from the train." Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Fix, 88 Ind. 381, 45 Am. Rep. 464.

And in a similar subsequent case it is held that if a passenger has a right to be carried on his ticket he may insist upon being so carried, and if he is ejected he is entitled to recover the damages sustained thereby, although he may take the other course, and pay his fare rather than be ejected, and recover such damages as he sustains in that event. Pennsylvania Co. v. Bray, 125 Ind. 229.

A railroad company cannot require a passenger to comply with a regulation to show his ticket, where the train does not go through to his destination and his ticket is taken up without any transfer check being given, and the passenger takes the next train from that stopping point, from which train he is ejected for nonpayment of fare. Townsend v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Thomp. & C. 495. In this case the court said: "If he had bought another ticket at Poughkeepsie and had then sued the company for the extra sum paid, what cause of action would he have had? They would have just said: We never refused to carry you to Rhinebeck. Taking up your ticket was no refusal. We always take up tickets at some point before the end of the journey."

On a previous appeal in Townsend v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 56 N. Y. 295, 15 Am. Rep. 419, it was held that the passenger had no right on the second train, and that when the conductor told him he must pay his fare or leave the car, he then knew that he could not proceed upon the ticket taken, but should resort to his remedy the same as though he had been ejected. 43 L. If there were negligent, wilful, or intentional acts, or omission to act, upon plaintiff's part after the wrongful act, by which it was aggravated, increased, or enlarged, they will not prevent him from recovering damages for so much of the injury as the original wrongdoer caused by his negligence.

The court said "If, after this notice, he waits for the application of force to remove him, he does so in his own wrong; he invites the use of the force necessary to remove him; and if no more is applied than is necessary to effect the object, he can neither recover against the conductor or company therefor. . . . No one has a right to resort to force to compel the performance of a contract made with him by another."

The supreme court in 6 Thomp. & C. 495, affirming a judgment for compensatory damages, referring to this opinion says that "the decision of this case in the court of appeals, 56 N. Y. 295, 15 Am. Rep. 419 held that exemplary damages were not proper."

The supreme court evidently in this case interpreted the law differently from the court of appeals, although limiting the recovery to compensatory damages. It is said that the supreme court refused to allow an appeal from its last decision, and as the damages allowed were $75 no further appeal could be taken.

The supreme court distinguished the case of Weaver v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 3 Thomp. & C. 270, as there the plaintiff was negligent; but in the present case the plaintiff was not to blame.

In Ray v. Cortland & H. Traction Co. 19 App. Div. 530, the court says: "The rule suggested in the Townsend Case [56 N. Y. 295, 15 Am. Rep. 419], does not seem to have been followed in that or subsequent cases."

It is not the duty of the passenger to pay the fare and to remain on the train in order to protect the railroad company against the consequences of the mistake of a prior conductor who neglects to give a proper stop-over. Yorton v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 62 Wis. 367.

In a former trial of this case in 54 Wis. 234, 41 Am. Rep. 23, where the evidence differed some, it was held that he could not complain of injuries received from being ejected on a cold night at a station where there was no shelter, as the passenger brought this exposure upon himself by his own conduct in refusing to pay his fare.

But in some cases it was held that it was the duty of a passenger to pay the fare demanded, or leave the train, where a previous conductor failed to give a transfer. Homiston v. Long Island R. Co. 3 Misc. 342; Mahoney v. Detroit Street R. Co. 93 Mich. 612, 18 L. R. A. 335; Van Dusen v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 97 Mich. 439; Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. 135 Mass. 409, 46 Am. Rep. 481.

Where a conductor on a train failed to give a transfer check and called to the other conductor "This man's fare is paid," and the second conductor claimed that he did not understand him and ejected the passenger for nonpayment of fare, it was held that the wrongful taking of

In such cases the damages may be apportioned, and a deduction made by the jury for that portion of the injury due to plaintiff's fault or omission.

a passenger's ticket by the conductor of a previous train did not justify a passenger in violating the lawful regulations on another train. The court said: "A passenger, under such circumstances, has the right to refuse to pay fare, but, when demanded by the conductor, he must either pay or walk peaceably off the train, and his remedy is an action against the company for damages sustained by any detention or any humiliation suffered from having to walk off the train." Homiston v. Long Island R. Co. 8 Misc. 342. In this case the court said that "if he waits for the application of force to remove him, he does so in his own wrong; he invites the use of the force necessary to remove him, and if no more force is applied than is necessary to effect the object, he can neither recover against the conductor or the company therefor."

In Sanford v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 23 N. Y. 343, 80 Am. Dec. 286, it was held to be the duty of a passenger to pay the fare demanded, although he claimed the right to ride in that street car because he had paid passage on the previous day on another car, which failed to carry him through owing to the ice and snow. But the refusal to pay did not justify an expulsion while the cars were in motion, and the passenger could lawfully resist an attempt to eject him in such a case.

In Weaver v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 3 Thomp. & C. 270, where a passenger paid for three tickets and only received two for the persons with him, it was said: "The conduct of this plaintiff, his readiness under the circumstances to get up a quarrel on this question with the conductor, and lay the basis of a lawsuit by requiring him to expel him from the cars, leaving his wife and niece behind, before he would pay the small sum of $1.35 for the fare, which it appears by his subsequent offer he had ample means in hand to pay at the time, serve to vindicate the propriety of the regulation, and justify the conductor in refusing to disobey the instructions of his employers, in reliance upon the personal veracity of this plaintiff."

So, where a passenger was wrongfully ejected for having a wrong transfer check given him by a conductor on another street car, the court said that "if the company has agreed to furnish him with a proper ticket, and has failed to do so, he is not at liberty to assert and maintain by force his rights under that contract; but he is bound to yield, for the time being, to the reasonable practice and requirements of the company, and enforce his rights in a more appropriate way." Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. 135 Mass. 409, 46 Am. Rep. 481.

And where a passenger on a street car was compelled to take the next car on account of the one upon which he was riding stopping at the barns, and he was not given a transfer check, it was held that it was the plaintiff's reasonable and clear duty to pay his fare and seek redress from the defendant for a violation of his contract. Mahoney v. Detroit Street R. Co. 93 Mich. 612, 18 L. R. A. 335. In this case a judgment for nominal damages for ejection was affirmed, the court saying that the verdict should have been directed for the defendant.

And where a conductor failed to give a passenger on a round-trip ticket a check on change of conductors, leaving him only the return part of the ticket, and he was ejected for refusing to pay fare, it was held that it was his duty to leave the train peaceably or pay his fare and to seek his remedy for damages, and the damages which he suffered by the fault of the first conductor were covered by the recovery of the amount of fare which he was compelled by his fault to pay. Van Dusan v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 97 Mich. 439.

IV. Where the conductor demanding fare is in fault.

In SPRENGER v. TACOMA TRACTION COMPANY, it is held that payment to avoid expulsion need not be made where a street-car passenger pays his fare and is ejected for not paying again, although he has other tickets which he can use and thus prevent his ejection. In this case it was said that the general rule is unquestioned that it is the duty of one who has been deprived of the contract right, to reduce the damages as much as possible; but in this case there was such a disregard of the rights of the plaintiff as to deprive the defendant of the benefit of this rule, even if it ordinarily applied to cases of this kind. The court said that plaintiff was placed in such a position that it was not his duty to use another ticket, and thus tacitly admit that he had been guilty of trying to beat the company as claimed by the conductor.

There is some conflict of authority as to the passenger's duty to pay fare wrongfully demanded so as to avoid an expulsion, where the conductor demanding the fare is in fault. Some of the cases deny that it is his duty on the ground that it will be an admission that he is trying to defraud the company, other cases do so on the ground that to pay in such a case will be buying what the passenger already owns. In some of the cases holding that it is the duty to pay to avoid an illegal expulsion, the passenger desired and expected to be expelled. Some cases hold that the passenger is unreasonable to insist on ejection, applying the maxim "To the willing mind there is no injury."

The following cases hold that it is not the duty of the passenger to pay fare to avoid an expulsion:

In Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Arnold, 8 Ind. App. 297, it was held that where a passenger gives his ticket to the conductor it is not his duty to pay fare wrongfully demanded again of him, and afterwards settle the question in dispute with the company or its agent. This Heyt, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant was operating a street-car line in the city of Tacoma, and plaintiff was a passenger on one of its cars. He was ejected therefrom by the conductor for the alleged nonpayment of his fare, and brought this action to recover damages, claiming that he had paid his fare, and that he was unlawfully ejected. The trial resulted in a verdict for $100 damages, upon which judgment was duly rendered. In its brief defendant has discussed the alleged errors of the trial court under numerous heads, but for the purposes of this opinion they can be so grouped as to present but four distinct propositions. Of was so held on the ground that the principle involved is the same as if the sum demanded had been a large one, and that it is the privilege of every person to stand upon his strict legal rights, and the law does not require him to yield them, or make concessions to avoid trouble. The court said that "if he had paid the extra fare demanded after such accusations, legitimate inference might be drawn therefrom that he was guilty of dishonesty attributed to him."

And where the conductor fails to give a stop-over check on a ticket entitling to stop over at all points, and the passenger stops over and presents the remainder of the ticket to the same conductor the next day, he is under no obligation, in order to avoid being ejected, to pay the additional fare demanded and sue for the return thereof as money paid under duress. Cherry v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 52 Mo. App. 499. In this case the court said: "Notwithstanding the rulings of some of the courts which look that way, we think no such course was incumbent on the plaintiff, since he would thereby be purchasing a right he had already. The plaintiff was under no obligation to purchase, even for a trifle, the right which was already his own."

And where the conductor by mistake refuses a return ticket supposing that it had expired, and the company claims that it is the passenger's duty to pay his fare and to rely upon his remedy to recover it back, or leave the train and not provoke or make necessary an assault; and that the amount of damages shall be limited to the exact fare paid with interest,—the court says: "We fully concede that no one has a right to resort to force to compel the performance of a contract made with him by another; and a passenger about to be wrongfully expelled from a railroad train need not require force to be exerted to secure his rights, or increase his damages." But the court held that "where a passenger with a clear right and a clean ticket is entitled to ride on that trip and train, and is wrongfully ejected without forcible resistance upon his part, the jury are, and ought to be, allowed great latitude in assessing damages." Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Rice, 38 Kan. 398.

In Zagelmeyer v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co. 102 Mich. 214, a recovery was allowed for an expulsion for failing to pay an unlawful excessive fare demanded for not having a ticket. The court says: "But it is contended that inasmuch as the plaintiff might have paid his fare, and avoided being expelled from the car, he is entitled to recover no substantial damages. We are cited to various Michigan cases as sustaining this doctrine. But all the cases cited are cases in which the plaintiff had no ticket which, as between himself and the conductor, these two relate to the rejection of testimony offered on the part of the defendant, the third to instructions given to the jury and refusals to instruct, and the fourth to the measure of damages.

Plaintiff, having testified that he had paid his fare, and that thereafter he had been compelled to leave the car by the action of the conductor and motorman, was asked by defendant's counsel if he had not been put off of the street cars before for refusal to pay fare. This question he answered in the negative. Whereupon he was asked if he had not been put off the Northern Pacific Railroad cars for nonpayment of fare. Upon objection of the plaintiff, the court refused to entitle him to ride upon the car in question, and in which there was no tender of the legal fare made. We think the case of Hufford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 53 Mich. 121, 64 Mich. 631, fully recognizes the right of the plaintiff to recover substantial damages for being evicted from the car when he either produces a ticket or stands ready to pay the legal fare."

A passenger is not bound to comply with an illegal demand for an excessive fare, and a railroad company has no right to eject him from the train for a refusal to comply with such a demand. Wilsey v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 83 Ky. 511.

And it is not the duty of a passenger having a good ticket on a steamship to pay fare again in order to secure stateroom and meals which are refused him by the purser because he does not pay fare again on being charged with using another person's ticket, which is not shown to be nontransferable. Gleason v. The Willamette Valley, 71 Fed. Rep. 712.

In this case the court said: "If Gleason had the right to travel on the ticket he held as a first-class passenger, he had the right to do so without being compelled to pay any additional fare."

But, in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Trimble, 34 Ark. 354, where a passenger was ejected for refusing to pay an excessive fare wrongfully demanded, it was held that where the plaintiff entered a train with the expectation and desire to be put off in order to make a case against the railroad company, he could not recover for wounded feelings, and the recovery will be limited to actual damages for wrongful ejection. The court said: "To the willing mind there is no injury;" and also said that generally the passenger's knowledge that the railroad would eject him unless he consented to submit to an illegal exaction, would not deprive him of the right to recover for mental injuries suffered from the indignity. But here the court refused to apply that rule on account of the passenger's desire and expectation of ejection.

Where a conductor, wrongfully but honestly believing it was his duty, removed a passenger from the train for refusing to pay five cents illegally demanded, and no more force was used than was necessary, it was held that exemplary damages could not be recovered. The court said: "The plaintiff reached his destination without expense, within an hour or two of the time by rail, walking 2 or 3 miles. And he voluntarily preferred to take this course rather than pay five cents, which he might have recovered by law if illegally taken." Louisville, & G. S. R. Co. v. Guinan, 11 Lea, 98, 47 Am. Rep. 279.

In Southern P. R. Co. v. Patterson, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 451, where an excessive fare was demanded for crossing a bridge, and the passenger allow him to answer, and it is claimed that in so doing it committed error. A large number of cases have been cited to show that it is competent to prove that one has been guilty of a certain offense by proof of the commission of other offenses of the same nature. But in our opinion none of these cases are applicable to the question here presented. The fact that plaintiff had had trouble about the payment of his fare upon a railroad train would bear so remotely upon the question as to his attempting to beat the street car out of a five-cent fare that it was properly excluded from the consideration of the jury. The ruling of the court, which allowed the defendant to attempt to show that the plaintiff had had trouble about the payment of fare upon street cars, was as favorable to the defendant as it could ask.

The conductor, having testified that he collected fare on the side of the car upon which the plaintiff was sitting, up to and including that of a woman sitting next to him, before he left that side to collect fares upon the other, and that, when he returned to the side from which he first collected fares, he sought to collect the fare of the plaintiff, was asked by defendant's counsel a question which sought to elicit from the witness a statement as to the reasons why he was sure he had left off collecting upon the side of the car upon which the plaintiff sat, with the woman was expelled, it was held that if the passenger was informed before night by the conductor that his ticket did not entitle him to free transportation over a bridge, and that he would receive his fare and pay it over to the bridge conductor so that he would not be disturbed by the conductor in the night, and that if he had paid the same he would not have been disturbed, and that when the bridge conductor demanded the bridge fare the plaintiff refused to pay the same for the purpose of enhancing the damages, the aggravated damages caused by the intentional acts of the plaintiff would not be allowed him in assessing the damages if the jury should find for plaintiff.

In Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Cole, 29 Ohio St. 126, 23 Am. Rep. 729, where a passenger was wrongfully ejected for not paying an extortionate fare, it was held that a publication in the newspaper of a communication from the plaintiff written after the expulsion, to the effect that the people should ride on that road and make money, when the railroad attempted to extort such fare, was improperly rejected as evidence. The court held that this evidence showed the quo animo of the plaintiff, and showed that he entered the car expecting to be ejected for the purpose of making money out of the transaction, and that so far as injuries to feelings were concerned it tended to show that it was a fair case for the application of the maxim that "to the willing mind there is no injury." "The question of the lawfulness of the fare could have been raised and settled as well without the expulsion as with it."

And where a passenger on a street car was wrongfully ejected for refusing to pay again, after he had been handed the wrong change by the driver who assured him that if he paid again the company would correct the mistake at the office, the court said that "the request of the driver to adjust the matter is competent to go to the jury in mitigation of damages." Curtis v. Louisville City R. Co. 94 Ky. 573, 21 L. R. A. 649.

In this case the driver was the conductor.

In Gibson v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 904, where the conductor made a mistake in demanding extra fare for a child, the case of Hall v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 57, was followed, holding that it is the duty of the passenger to pay the extra fare demanded by the conductor if able to do so, and rely on his remedy to recover the amount before a justice of the peace or other competent court, and that damages cannot be increased by an obstinate resistance to the demands of the conductor and by forcing him to expel the passenger from the train. The court said that the passenger can take that course undoubtedly and sue for damages for a breach of the contract or of the public duty of the carrier, but his own 43 L. R. A.

unreasonable conduct in resisting a fairly reasonable demand of the conductor can be taken by the jury as a mitigation of damages, and will reduce them to nominal or actual damage sustained by the delay.

So, it was held that a passenger could not recover for personal injuries caused by necessary force in removing him, although the expulsion was wrongful because not made at a regular stopping place, and made for refusing to pay ten cents extra for failure to have a ticket. He could not recover exemplary damages for being put off at a place other than the station on account of his own wrong in not paying the extra ten cents or in not purchasing a ticket at the station. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Wilson, 23 Ill. App. 63.

In this case the court said: "How easily the appellee could have avoided all his trouble and inconvenience and humiliation in being put off the train by simply doing what was right and what the law compelled him to do, paying the insignificant sum of ten cents. If a man will thus act, and receives indignity and humiliation in consequence, he should be compelled to charge it to his own account, and accept it with the best grace possible."

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Roberts, 40 Ill. 503, where a passenger was wrongfully ejected at a place which was not a regular station for refusal to pay the fare, and no special injury occurred, the court said: "This was a violation of the statute, for which the road must pay nominal damages, but what there is in this case to entitle the defendant in error to anything further, we are wholly unable to discover. He suffered no injury from the expulsion. The only disagreeable consequence was the necessity of walking 2 miles to Summit, which he could have avoided by paying the fare. If the defendant in error had been devoting himself to voluntary martyrdom for the sake of establishing a great principle, we could comprehend his conduct."

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Connell, 112 Ill. 295, 54 Am. Rep. 238, it was held that a passenger was not required to pay fare wrongfully demanded, but that he should leave the train when requested to do so, and rely on an action of damages for breach of contract, and not invite the use of force, where he had a proper ticket but the conductor under instruction refused to honor it.

In this case the court said: "The question presented is, whether he can recover damages for being forcibly expelled from the train, or was it his duty, when notified by the conductor that he would not receive the ticket, to pay his fare under protest, or leave the train and hold the company responsible for the expulsion, without compelling the conductor to resort to force. Had appellee paid the fare demanded, he might who sat next to him. The objection of plaintiff to this question was sustained, and it is claimed that, in sustaining it, the court committed error. In determining as to the correctness of this ruling it must be remembered that the question was put by defendant to its own witness, that he had testified positively to the fact that plaintiff had not paid his fare, and that he had left off collecting upon that side with the woman sitting next to plaintiff. This being so, it was not competent for defendant to bolster up the testimony of its own witness by asking for the reasons which had led him to come to the conclusions to which he had testified. It might have been competent for the plaintiff, in cross-examination, to have gone into this question; but, until this was done, the testimony, when offered upon the part of the defendant, was properly excluded.

It will not be necessary to notice in detail the exceptions to the instructions, for the reasons that such exceptions are founded largely upon questions going to the measure of damages, which will be hereinafter considered. It will be sufficient to say that, in view of the measure of damages as to which, under the evidence, we think the jury should have been instructed, the instructions sufficiently and correctly stated the law of the case. It appeared from the uncontradicted testimony, that the plaintiff had several oth-have sued the company and recovered for a breach of the contract. Had he left the train when the conductor refused to receive the ticket and ordered him to leave, he might have sued and recovered for all damages sustained in consequence of the act of the conductor expelling him from the train. . . . When the conductor demanded that appellee should pay fare or leave the train, he would have been justified in refusing to pay fare, and in leaving the train on the command of the conductor, and had he done so he would have received no personal injuries, and might then have brought his action and recovered, as before stated; but when he refused to leave the train, and thus compelled the conductor to resort to force, he cannot recover for an injury which he voluntarily brought upon himself."

In White v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 107 Mich. 681, a recovery was refused where a passenger whose proper mileage had been taken by the conductor allowed himself to be put off for nonpayment of other fare, without attempting to explain or show his mileage book, or prove to the conductor where he had paid his fare to. The court said: "It appears conclusively that it was the plaintiff's own fault that he was put off, and the conclusion is also inevitable that he permitted himself to be put off for the purpose of bringing an action against the company for damages."

In Magee v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 46 Fed. Rep. 734, it was said "that a person who is able to pay his fare twice should pay twice if it is exacted, rather than suffer unnecessarily the humiliation and other consequent injuries of being ejected, and then claim enhanced damages by reason of peculiar suffering from the ejection."

V. Where the passenger loses his ticket.

It seems that there are but few cases on the question of the duty of the passenger to pay fare twice if he has lost his ticket. The courts of New York and Illinois slightly differ as to the rule of damages for ejection, where he produces a reasonable amount of evidence to the conductor showing that it is paid for and can be used by no other person, as in the case of a drawing-room or a sleeping-car berth ticket.

A passenger who purchases a seat in a drawing-room car and loses the same, but obtains from the ticket agent a written statement of such purchase, which is refused by the conductor, is not bound to pay the price of the seat again, and is entitled to stand on the right acquired by his original purchase, and the company is liable for removing the passenger to another car. Buck v. Webb, 58 Hun, 185. In this case the court distinguishes a case claimed to shield the defendant from liability, holding that such cases "were either passage or fare tickets, not restricted to any car or train, or were detached in such a manner as to deprive the passenger of his right to the passage, or the time to which their use had been limited had previously expired." The court held in this case that the company was liable to compensate the passenger for his exclusion from his seat, and the moral compulsion to which he submitted of passing to and making his passage in another car.

In an exactly similar case, Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Reed, 75 Ill. 125, 20 Am. Rep. 232, where it was claimed that the loss of the ticket imposed on the passenger the obligation of purchasing another one or of paying the conductor the price in money, it was held that where the circumstances were such that it was reasonably ascertained that the company could not be defrauded he should have the berth; but the damages for an expulsion to another car were held to be the price paid for his ticket and a reasonable compensation for the trouble and inconvenience he suffered in being deprived of his berth in the sleeping car.

And in Standish v. Narragansett S. S. Co. 111 Mass. 512, 15 Am. Rep. 66, it was held that $50 was ample damages for detention on a steamer for two hours after losing his ticket, where a passenger had sufficient money to pay his fare, and that it was his duty to have paid the same, and that he was the unnecessary cause of his own detention. The court held that the defendant had the right to detain the passenger a reasonable time to investigate on the spot the circumstances of the case; but that if he was detained for the purpose of compelling him to pay his fare or give up his ticket, or detained an unreasonable time to investigate his case, or in an unreasonable way, he was entitled to recover.

In this case the passenger had occupied his stateroom all night, and had obtained the room by a pencil memorandum made on his ticket by an officer of the boat, but subsequently lost his ticket.

VI. Conclusion.

There is no uncontradicted rule respecting the duty of a passenger who has already paid for transportation in regard to payment of fare to avoid an expulsion and keep down damages. Some cases try to adhere to the rule that a passenger must always show a clean, clear ticket to avoid the obligation of paying again or else leave the train. Other cases go to the other extreme holding the company responsible for the mistakes of its agents even to binding their successors. The question arises in different ways, e. g., where an agent sells a second-class ticket for a first-class ticket; where he punches the ticket to the wrong destination; where he limits the ticket to a wrong date or an impossible date; where the train agent misdirects the pas-er tickets, one of which he could have used in payment of his fare, and thus have prevented his ejection for not paying; and it is earnestly contended on the part of the defendant that, under the well-settled rule that it is the duty of one who has been deprived of a contract right to reduce the damages flowing from the violation of the contract as much as possible, it was the duty of the plaintiff to have used one of the tickets in his possession, by doing which he would have reduced the damages growing out of the wrongful act of the conductor to the sum represented by the value of the ticket. The general rule contended for by the defendant is unquestioned, and it may be conceded that thereunder the defendant would only have been liable in such an amount of damages as was necessarily imposed upon the plaintiff by its wrongful action, if such wrongful action had not been committed by it under circumstances which showed a disregard for the rights of the plaintiff. If no evidence had been introduced tending to show that there had been a want of care and investigation on the part of the conductor before he acted upon the claim that plaintiff had not paid his fare, there might be reason for the application of the rule contended for, though many of the cases hold that such rule is not applicable to a contract of carriage by a common carrier with a passenger. But there was evidence sufficient to go to the jury to show that there had been such a disregard of the rights of the plaintiff as to deprive the defendant of the benefit of this rule, even if it applied to cases of this kind. The undisputed proof showed that, with the delay of a few minutes, the conductor could have made an investigation which would have definitely determined whether or not the plaintiff had paid his fare; and, in view of the plaintiff's claim that he had paid it, which claim was supported by the statements of at least two of his fellow passengers, good faith required that such investigation should have been made before making the definite charge that plaintiff was attempting to beat his way over the road, and enforcing such charge by his expulsion from the car. In view of the action of the conductor, the plaintiff was placed in such a position that it was not his duty to use another ticket, and thus tacitly admit that he had been guilty of trying to beat the company, as claimed by the conductor. This being so, the instructions as to the measure of damages were what they should have been, and the evidence was such that the verdict for $100 was not excessive.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Dunbar, Scott, Anders, and Gordon,

senger, after examining his ticket, to the wrong train; where a previous conductor fails to give a proper stop-over or no stop-over, or no transfer check, or detaches the wrong part of his ticket; where the passenger loses his sleeping-car ticket which is good only for that train and berth, and supplies it with a writing from the Pullman car agent; where the train after starting has been unreasonably delayed by obstructions or otherwise so that the passenger goes to a hotel to wait for a through train,—and in many other cases.

It does not seem unjust to hold that a passenger ought to be required to pay fare, even if it is not justly due to the carrier, in order to avoid unnecessary damages, in a case where he has got upon a train knowing, or having fair opportunity to know, that he has not the proper evidence of his right to ride. In such a case his own fault or negligence may properly be held to preclude him from insisting that his own word be accepted by the conductor in respect to his right to ride. But in such cases it may be fairly urged that the passenger is not in fact entitled to ride upon the train without further payment, and that the demand upon him for fare is rightfully made in the exercise of the conductor's duty, and therefore it is the duty of the passenger to pay it, not merely to keep down damages, but because as between him and the conductor he has no right to ride without paying it. But when the passenger has not been negligent—when, having paid for his ride, he has got upon a train with a ticket which he reasonably supposes to be good for his transportation, the question involved is simply the question of duty to submit to an improper and unjust demand in order to keep down damages. The cases which affirm that such is the passenger's duty seem to be anomalous so far as they require a submission to an unlawful demand in order to procure protection from a threatened assault or other tort. The doctrine of a duty to minimize damages does not seem to have been carried so far as this in any other class of cases, or to be justly applicable to excuse any party from liability for intentionally inflicting injuries. It is proper to require due care on the part of a person to avoid increasing his own damages, but the reason for the rule ceases when the damage to be avoided is a voluntary injury threatened by the other party who claims the benefit of the doctrine. For a carrier to say to a passenger: "You must submit to extortion in order to prevent me from assaulting you, else you will be deemed in law to have caused your own damage needlessly,"—is equivalent to an attempt by the carrier to profit by its own wrongful threats. It amounts to a claim of exemption from liability for an assault because the wrongdoer first offered his victim a choice between assault and extortion.

STATE of Washington
v.

A. P. TUGWELL et al.

(19 Wash. 238.)

1. Liability to punishment for contempt for publishing articles tending to embarrass the court pending a suit is not taken away by a constitutional provision giving every person the right to freely write and publish on all subjects, being responsible for abuse of that right.
2. Punishment for contempt may be imposed upon one who, pending a suit, publishes articles which will tend to embarrass the court in deciding it, where the statutes have adopted the common law governing the punishment of contempts.
3. A newspaper article published before the final determination of a cause, stating that the decision rendered is "rotten," that the judge who rendered it had no mind, and intimating that he was corrupt and that he misstated the facts, is a contempt of court.
4. The supreme court retains jurisdiction to punish for contempt one making a publication tending to embarrass it in the decision of a case, even after the rendition of an opinion and the time for rehearing has elapsed, if time still remains for application for modification of the opinion, which is made soon after the article is published.

(April 14, 1898.)

PROCEEDINGS to punish defendants for an alleged contempt of court. Punishment imposed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. P. H. Winston, Attorney General, T. M. Vance, and A. R. Titlow, for the State:

The American doctrine is that both direct and constructive contempts are punishable by the court wherever they are intended or calculated to influence the action of the court or impair its authority with regard to pending causes.

This court has the power to punish the defendants for a contempt if it appear, (1) that the article was contemptuous, calculated to obstruct justice and impair the authority of the court; (2) if at the time of its publication there was a cause pending in the court.

An action is pending until the judgment is fully certified.

At common law all courts of record have an inherent power to punish contempts committed in facie curiæ, such power being essential to the very existence of a court as such, and granted as a necessary incident in establishing a tribunal as a court.

Statutes may be in affirmation of the common-law powers of courts, and may regulate the mode of procedure and prescribe what punishment may be inflicted, but they cannot deprive a court of power which is necessarily inherent in it to hear and determine matters of contempt.

Messrs. John C. Stallcup and Richard Winsor, for defendants:

The doctrine of constructive contempts is un-American and out of harmony with the constitutional guaranties of nearly all the states, and one that should not be maintained in America.

A statute defining and regulating contempt proceedings is a limitation upon the power formerly exercised by courts to punish contempts.

After the rehearing and decision thereon, a case is no longer before the court.

Per Curiam:

On the 3d of March, 1898, the attorney general filed an information against, and moved for a rule upon, the defendants, to show cause why an attachment should not issue against them for contempt of court in respect to the publication on the 24th of February, 1898, in a certain weekly newspaper in the city of Tacoma, known as the "Tacoma Sun," of the following article, to wit: "The supreme court of this state has again eased its conscience, if it ever had any to ease, by its infernal rotten decision in the Tacoma warrant case . . . [naming a member of the court] can now sit snugly up alongside some other supreme simpletons, and suck the hind teat of plutocracy. It is said that he changed his mind. Suffering saints, who ever made a charge that he had a mind to change? It is true, he voted the other way when the case was up before; but nobody ever accused him of having a mind; and even if they did, after reading the decision in the warrant case referred to, which he is supposed to have written, they would know that the accusation had no foundation, and could not be substantiated. This decision is only remarkable for its malignant, dishonest, and damnable distortions of, not only the law, but also the facts. It states the facts shockingly contrary to the truth, as shown by the record in the case, as will be seen by the dissenting opinion that will soon be filed. It is the conception of an ass, a lean-witted, anile leripoop, who no doubt thinks he would rather be rich than be right. We speak of . . . more particularly because he flopped. What made him flop he knows best, but everyone else has a good idea. There is only one thing about . . . that pleases me, and that is his term soon ends, and he will be relegated to that everlasting oblivion that awaits all of these last rotten articles of Republicanism. How long, O Merciful Creator of the Universe, are we to still suffer for the misdeeds of dishonest, corrupt, and disreputable public servants? The people of Tacoma have lived in a wild and reckless revel of Republican rule. They have drunk deep from the foul cup that folly has filled with perfumed poison and held to trusting lips, while the sweet, sensuous song sung by Satan's sirens lulled the senses to fancied rest, security, and safety as they plunged headlong into the frightful chasm of debt, at the bottom of which they will find destitution, destruction, dishonor, and death. While yet money can be raised, our citizens ought to erect a monument in memory of the past, to stand as a solemn warning for the future. The pedestal or base should be of busted banks. Six stalwart representatives of Republicanism—such, say, as Boggs and McCauley, Hedges and Holmes, Shane and McKane—should stand shoulder to shoulder, with hands clasped and eyes raised, with a look of envious emulation at the central figure yet above them all. And that figure should be, . . . on the top of a long shaft, straddling the American eagle, in one hand a bunch of illegal warrants, and in the other a double-barreled horse pistol, and as he commands fair Tacoma to kneel down and take one more dose of the vile, nauseating stuff, distillations of Republican rottenness, that this supreme court has fixed up for us. Then circling around all we would have the Republican council dancing like diabolical demons, trying to put out a huge bonfire made from the wreck and ruin of a light plant the city once owned, with imaginary water from a water plant for which the city paid more than a million real dollars. If all this could be placed in the public park, where good pious people could go when the weather was nice and warm, and sit on the benches, amidst the perfume of sweet flowers, with a picture of Gratton H. Wheeler in one hand and Walter J. Thompson in the other, oh, what a flood of tender memories would float over the soul! Oh, what a history, pages without printing, volumes without words! But Tacoma will never down. She will fight for justice till the last dishonest damn rascal that drags his slimy carcass across the road to justice shall have been fed to the crows. Men who have forgotten more law than . . . and his stud of supercilious asses ever knew have studied this warrant question for months and years; and they say the warrants have been paid; that they are dead, and should not be paid again. This is only a touch of the tail end of Republican prosperity of the past; but let us go on to the future. The day fast comes when the stains of disgrace and dishonor those perfidious and pusillanimous tools of the trusts have placed upon the fair name and fame of Washington 43 L. R. A.

will be wiped out forever. We must fight the ground inch by inch until honest men, who see no Klondike in the bench, shall be elected,—men who have the people's interests at heart, as well as the interest of the bondholder and warrant shark. This state will rise in its wrath, and, when fall comes, vicious, vacillating . . . will be swept into oblivion forever."

The information charged that the defendant Tugwell was editor and Baker was associate editor of the newspaper, and that such publication was made of and concerning the cause of W. C. Bardsley, plaintiff, against W. A. Sternberg, treasurer of the city of Tacoma, defendant, then pending in this court. 18 Wash. 612. The rule to show cause was issued, and the defendants appeared and answered to the information. They admitted that on the 24th of February, 1898, defendant Tugwell was editor and defendant Baker associate editor of the weekly newspaper known as the "Tacoma Sun," published in the city of Tacoma, and that they published the article set forth in the information. They denied that on the 24th day of February, 1898, or at any time thereafter, there was still pending in this court the cause of Bardsley v. Sternberg; denied that, by the publication of the article stated in the information, they were guilty of any act or omission towards the court defined and deemed by the laws of the state to be a contempt of court; alleged that under the facts stated, and under the laws and Constitution of the state, they had a right to publish the facts and comments as they appear in the article set out in the information; denied that they were amenable to the court for the publication; denied the right or power of the court to call upon them to answer as in these proceedings required, and denied that the publication amounted to a contempt. The attorney general thereupon demurred to the answer, on the ground that it set up no defense, and stated no reason why attachment should not issue against defendants. The facts relative to the pendency of the cause of Bardsley v. Sternberg were of record in this court when the case was argued. The cause of Bardsley v. Sternberg was argued and submitted at the May session, 1897. On June 22, 1897, an opinion was filed by this court affirming the judgment of the superior court in such cause, two of the judges at that time dissenting from the opinion then filed. On July 20, 1897, counsel for the appellant Bardsley duly filed a petition for rehearing, and a rehearing thereafter was granted, and the cause reargued in this court. On February 18, 1898, the opinion of the court was filed reversing the judgment of the superior court. On February 24, 1898, a dissenting opinion in which two of the judges joined was filed. On February 28, 1898, a petition for a modification of the opinion of the majority of the court filed on the 18th day of February was filed in this court by Messrs. John P. Judson, John C. Stallcup, and B. F. Heuston, attorneys for respondent; and on March 2, 1898, a majority opinion of the court was filed, denying the last petition for modification of the opinion of reversal, and final judgment entered in the cause on the 2d day of March 1898 (18 Wash. 650), and on March 9, 1898, the remittitur issued.

Section 5, art. 1, of the Constitution of Washington, contained in the Bill of Rights, is as follows: "Every person may freely speak, write, and publish on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right." The statute of the state defining contempts (2 Ballinger's Codes & Statutes, § 5798, 2 Hill's Code, § 778) is as follows: "The following acts or omissions, in respect to a court of justice or proceedings therein, are deemed to be contempts of court: (1) Disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior toward the judge while holding the court, tending to impair its authority, or to interrupt the due course of a trial or other judicial proceedings; (2) a breach of the peace, boisterous conduct, or violent disturbance tending to interrupt the due course of a trial or other judicial proceeding; (3) misbehavior in office, or other wilful neglect or violation of duty by an attorney, clerk, sheriff, or other person appointed or selected to perform a judicial or ministerial service; (4) deceit, abuse of the process, or proceedings of the court by a party to an action, suit, or special proceeding; (5) disobedience of any lawful judgment, decree, order, or process of the court; (6) assuming to be an attorney or other officer of the court, and acting as such without authority in a particular instance; (7) rescuing any person or property in the lawful custody of an officer, held by such officer under an order or process of such court; (8) unlawfully detaining a witness or party to an action, suit, or proceeding while going to, remaining at, or returning from, the court, where the same is for trial; (9) any other unlawful interference with the process or proceedings of a court; (10) disobedience of a subpoena duly served, or refusing to be sworn or answer as a witness; (11) when summoned as a juror in a court, improperly conversing with a party to an action, suit, or proceeding to be tried at such court, or with any other person in relation to the merits of such action, suit, or proceeding, or receiving a communication from a party, or other person in respect to it, without immediately disclosing the same to the court; (12) disobedience by an inferior tribunal, magistrate, or officer of the lawful judgment, decree, order, or process of a superior court, or proceeding in an action, suit, or proceeding contrary to law, after such action, suit, or proceeding shall have been removed from the jurisdiction of such inferior tribunal, magistrate, or officer." Section 5809 of the same Code (2 Hill's Code, § 789) is as follows: "Persons proceeded against according to the provisions of this chapter are also liable to indictment [or information] for the same misconduct, if it be an indictable offense, but the court before which a conviction is had on the indictment [or information] in passing sentence shall take into consideration the punishment before inflicted."

1. On the 25th day of February, 1898, a formal communication was received by the 43 L. R. A.

court from a reputable member of the bar of the city of Seattle, inclosing a copy of the newspaper containing the publication set out in the information, and praying its consideration by the court; and on the same day the newspaper containing the publication was delivered by mail to several members of the court. The communication and subject-matter thereof were then submitted to the attorney general by the court, and he thereupon filed the information. The principal question raised by the answer of the defendants, and argued by their counsel, is that, under the facts above stated, defendants had a right to publish the facts and comments in the publication set forth in the information. It is also maintained by the learned counsel for defendants that § 5, art. 1, of the Constitution of Washington guarantees to defendants, as charged, immunity from the jurisdiction and process in the nature of contempt of any court or judicial tribunal of any character whatever. In support of their contention, counsel for defendants have cited authorities from the courts of some of the other states.

The case of Dunham v. State (decided in 1858) 6 Iowa, 245, was an appeal from a conviction of contempt in the district court of the editor of a newspaper for publication of matter deemed offensive to the court. The Iowa statute, which was construed, defined a contempt as "contemptuous or insolent behavior toward the court, while engaged in the discharge of a judicial duty, which may tend to impair the respect due to its authority." The court said, after stating the acts of the respondent: "It will be observed that, except in relation to his comments, and the publication made of the proceedings in his own case, on the first hearing his articles had reference entirely to cases that were not before the court;" and as "there was no rule, general or special, prohibiting the publication of the speeches of counsel, remarks of the court, or giving a statement of the proceedings," it did not, under the circumstances, amount to a contempt. The court also observed: "We are strongly inclined to think, however, that the provisions of the Code upon this subject must be regarded as a limitation upon the power of the courts to punish for any other contempts. We can conceive of no possible state of case in which the exercise of this power might become necessary for the protection of the court, or the due administration of the law, that is not covered by these provisions. If such a case should, by possibility, arise, we would not say that, by virtue of its inherent power, the punishment might not be inflicted." It will be observed in this case that the gravamen of the publication made by the defendant was criticism and severe denunciation of the district judge for rulings in two cases which were finally concluded before the publication was made; and the court does not seem to regard the publication of proceedings occurring in a contempt proceeding against the defendant as falling within the statute, in the absence of a rule of the court forbidding the publication of such proceedings while still pending. In 1875, in the case of State v. Anderson, 40 Iowa, 207, cited by counsel, the court, referring to Dunham v. State, 6 Iowa, 245, said: "In that case it was held that the publication of articles in a newspaper, reflecting upon the conduct of a judge in relation to a cause pending in court, which had been disposed of before the publication, however unjust and libelous the publication may be, did not amount to contemptuous or violent behavior towards the court," under the statute; "nor that such articles were so calculated to impede, embarrass, or obstruct the court in the administration of the law as to justify the summary punishment of the offender," under the statute. And in the case in hand the court said: "The proceedings in the cause had been brought to a close, and what was said in the published article could in no manner influence the rulings of the court. The publication was not contemptuous or insolent behavior towards the court 'while engaged in the discharge of a judicial duty,' tending to impair the respect due to its authority." And the court expressly concludes with this declaration: "Whether, in case the article in question had been published while the court was engaged in the trial, or before the termination, of the cause in which the rulings of the court are criticised, it would have been sufficient to justify the court in punishing the author for contempt, we do not decide, for the reason that such state of case is not before us on the record." It may be observed that these two cases do not decide whether in Iowa the court may punish contempts other than specified in the statute, nor whether the court would deem a publication tending to embarrass or influence the court in a pending cause a contempt, and therefore do not aid the court to any considerable extent in the case at bar.

The case of Storey v. People, 79 Ill. 45, was where a publication in a newspaper censured the action of the grand jury, questioned its integrity as a body, and indirectly attacked the moral character of certain of its members; but the publication was made after the grand jury had acted upon and returned three indictments against defendant; which had already been filed in the court, and at the time of the publication of the record there were no complaints pending before the grand jury of any kind against the defendant. The court said: "The only question, therefore, is, assuming the articles to be libelous, whether the publishing of a libel on a grand jury, or on any of the members thereof, because of an act already done, may be summarily punished as a contempt. We do not understand the articles as having a tendency directly to impede, embarrass, or obstruct the grand jury in the discharge of any of its duties remaining to be discharged after the publications were made. No allusion is made to any matter upon which the members were thereafter to act, and there could therefore, of necessity, be no attempt to interfere with the exercise of their free and unbiased judgments as to such matters." And the court, referring to the case of People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195, 16 Am. Rep. 528, defined precisely what was considered and adjudged in that case,—"that the cause in reference to which the article was published was then pending before the court, undecided, and that the article was calculated to, and was designed to, influence the members of the court in deciding it"; and further observes that, "since the decision of that case, the statutes have been revised, and the provision in regard to contempts, before quoted, has been repealed, leaving no statute in force on that subject, except in regard to the enforcement of decrees in chancery, and the punishment of certain specific offenses, such as the failure of jurors to attend in obedience to summons, the failure of officers to make service and return of writs," etc., but observes: "Courts, however, possess certain common-law powers, subject to modifications that may have been imposed by our Constitution and statutes, among which is included that of punishing for contempt."

The case of Galland v. Galland, 44 Cal. 475, 13 Am. Rep. 167, was one of contempt in a court of equity by a husband for not paying a monthly sum for his wife's support, which he had been adjudged to pay; and on appeal the supreme court merely decided that the defendant might purge himself from the contempt by showing that he was unable to pay it, and that the inability had not been created by his own act. We presume the case was cited because of the following language of the opinion: "In this state the power of courts to punish for contempt has been regulated by statute. . . . This is a limitation upon the power formerly exercised by courts to punish for contempt; but whether courts in this state can exercise power in this respect in cases not named in the statute, or otherwise than it has provided, we are not called upon in this case to consider. In our opinion, however, where one is called before a court to answer for contempt for not doing an act which he has been adjudged to do, inquiry may properly be had as to whether it is still in his power to do it, and if it be not, he should not be adjudged guilty." We cannot perceive that the case is in point.

The case of Johnson v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 63 Cal. 578, arose upon the refusal of the court to allow process to a defendant in a divorce suit on the ground that he had not obeyed the order of the court requiring him to pay plaintiff her costs and counsel fees. The California Code [Civ. Proc. § 18] contained this provision: "No statute, law, or rule is continued in force because it is consistent with the provisions of this Code on the same subject; but in all cases provided for by this Code, all statutes, laws, and rules heretofore in force in this state, whether consistent or not with the provisions of this Code, unless expressly continued in force by it, are repealed and abrogated." The discussion in this case was upon the quantum and manner of the punishment that could be pronounced by the court for a disobedience of its order upon the defendant, and the court held that, the statute having prescribed the punishment, such provision was controlling.

Counsel for defendants seem to rely more particularly upon the case of State v. Kaiser, 20 Or. 50, 8 L. R. A. 584. This, again, was a punishment by the district court of a publisher of a newspaper for a libelous publication concerning the judge of the court. The Code of Oregon is identical with ours. The court observes: "The inherent power of a court of justice to punish parties for contempt who commit acts which have a direct tendency to obstruct or embarrass its proceedings in matters pending before it, or to influence decisions regarding such matters, is undoubted; but it can hardly be maintained, from the adjudications had upon the subject in the various states, that such power is broad enough to vest in the court the authority to so punish anyone for criticising the court on account of its procedure in matters which have fully terminated, however much its dignity and standing may be affected thereby. . . . In any event, it seems to me that the legislature has authority to limit the power of courts in regard to matters of contempt to the punishment only of such acts as are specified in the sections of the Code above set out. . . . The publication, according to the general definition given by Blackstone and by some of the more modern law writers upon the subject, would probably constitute contempt; but, under the Code of this state, it does not; nor do I think it would according to the weight of decisions made under the Constitutions of the various states. If it had reflected upon the conduct of the court with reference to a pending suit, and tended in any manner to influence its decision therein, it would, unquestionably, have been a contempt; but it was not shown that any suit was then pending by which the rights of any litigant were, or could have been, affected by it." It will be observed the supreme court of Oregon, upon a statute identical with ours, holds that a publication tending to embarrass or influence the action of the court in a cause pending before it is contempt. All the cases cited by counsel for the defendants have thus been examined, and in them does not seem to be found any substantial support of the principle of constitutional construction invoked here by them.

2. The constitutional liberty of speech and the press and the guaranties against its abridgment are found in the laws of all the American states and the Federal Constitution, and undoubtedly primarily grew out of the censorship of articles intended for publication by public authority. Such a censorship was inconsistent with free institutions, and with that free discussion of all public officers and agents required for the intelligent exercise of the right of suffrage; and thus the common law of libel was almost universally revised by statute, so that the truth of the publication could be given in evidence as defense. The arbitrary rule existing in England before the American Revolution was thus abrogated in this country. Parliament had assumed an extensive power to punish for contempt, as had likewise the English courts of common law. Under the rule frequently enforced by the English courts of that period, any criticism upon a judicial officer made at any time after the determination of the cause, of an offensive character, was deemed a contempt of court, and thus the rule was dangerous to public and individual liberty. This rule, however, has long since been abrogated in England, and the law of contempt there may be said to be now similar to that announced by the greater number of the American courts. Judge Cooley, on Constitutional Limitations, 5th ed. p. 521, says: "The constitutional liberty of speech and of the press, as we understand it, implies a right to freely utter and publish whatever the citizen may please, and to be protected against any responsibility for so doing, except so far as such publications, from their blasphemy, obscenity, or scandalous character, may be a public offense, or as by their falsehood and malice they may injuriously affect the standing, reputation, or pecuniary interests of individuals. Or, to state the same thing in somewhat different words, we understand liberty of speech and of the press to imply, not only liberty to publish, but complete immunity from legal censure and punishment for the publication, so long as it is not harmful in its character, when tested by such standards as the law affords. For these standards, we must look to the common-law rules which were in force when the constitutional guaranties were established, and in reference to which they have been adopted." And the same eminent jurist and commentator on constitutional law further says, at another place: "It is also been held in many cases that the publication of an article in a newspaper commenting on proceedings in court then pending and undetermined, or upon the court in its relation thereto, made at a time and under circumstances calculated to affect the course of justice in such proceedings, and obviously intended for that purpose, may be punished as a contempt, even though the court was not in session when the publication was made." And Mr. Bishop, a leading commentator on American Criminal Law, says: "By the commonly accepted doctrine, 'any publication, whether by parties or strangers, relating to a cause in court, tending to prejudice the public as to its merits, and to corrupt or embarrass the administration of justice,—or reflecting on the tribunal or its proceedings, or on the parties, the jurors, the witnesses, or the counsel,—may be visited as a contempt.'" 2 Bishop, New Crim. L. § 259. The learned editor of American Decisions, Mr. Freeman, in notes upon the Case of Sturro (N. H.) 97 Am. Dec. 630, states the rule from all the authorities: "It has long been settled, and is now generally acknowledged, that certain publications in newspapers may amount to contempts of court, and may be summarily punished as such. Publications pending a suit, reflecting upon the court, the jury, the parties, the officers of the court, or the attorneys, with reference to the suit, and having a tendency to influence the action of the tribunal before which the case is pending, is a contempt of that court, which may be summarily punished by attachment." 2 Story, Const. §§ 1774-1884; Ex parte Bollman, 4

Cranch, 75, 2 L. ed. 554; Ex parte Kearney, 7 Wheat. 38, 5 L. ed. 391; Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. 204, 5 L. ed. 242; Ex parte Bergman, 3 Wyo. 395; Savin, Petitioner, 131 U.S. 267, 33 L. ed. 50. Rapalje, a careful authority on Contempt, says, § 56, p. 70, with reference to publications reflecting on the court or its proceedings: "Any publication, pending a suit, reflecting on the court, the parties to the suit, the witnesses, the jurors, or the counsel, is a contempt of court."

The common law was adopted at the organization of Washington territory by the first legislative assembly. The state legislature enacted (Laws 1891, p. 31): "The common law, so far as it is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of the state of Washington, nor incompatible with the institutions and condition of society in this state, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this state." The law of contempt as enacted by the legislature of this state, and hereinbefore set out, is declaratory of the common law of contempt, as construed by the great majority of the American courts. This was the view held by the supreme court of Oregon in State v. Kaiser, 20 Or. 50, 8 L. R. A. 584, in construing the same statute. Chief Justice Thayer, in that case, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "As I view the said sections of the Code, they are little more than declaratory of the law upon the subject of contempt as understood by a large proportion of the courts of the several states at the time of their adoption." And the various adjudications of the American courts referred to have all had in view similar constitutional guaranties of freedom of speech and press as found in our state Constitution. The publisher of the article may be responsible in a civil or criminal action for libel; but if the article is calculated to embarrass or influence a court or prevent a fair trial between suitors in court, either by disturbing the independent verdict of the jury or the independent and unbiased conclusion of the court, it is contempt; and a judge of the court cannot in any action of libel, however it may reflect upon him personally, recover damages for such contempt. It is not a personal wrong, and does not affect the judge personally; but it is such an offense, as has been observed, as alone affects the court and the administration of justice, and the common law and statute affirmative thereof vest the punishment of such contempt in the court. The legislature of this state has specified punishment for contempts, and has adopted the common law relating to them. The right of suitors in courts, and of persons charged with offenses, to a fair trial, is guaranteed by our fundamental law. This is a sacred right, of very ancient origin. It was the cause, and is the only reason, for the existence of the judiciary as a co-ordinate department of the sovereignty of the state. It is this right of impartial trial which is violated by the publication and submission of an article to the court while a cause is pending yet undetermined, tending to embarrass or influence the court in its final conclusion; and the individual liberty of the citizen is gone when his personal rights are endangered or lost by such extraneous influences. It is this protection of the rights of suitors in a judicial action which compels the courts to exercise their jurisdiction of contempt. It is sometimes a delicate power for the court to exercise. It will ordinarily much more readily exercise its power to punish such contempts when the offensive acts have been directed towards the improper control or influence of a jury or witness or some officer of the court, for the reason that, when such acts are directed towards a court, there is always something of the appearance of the personality of the court involved. As observed by the supreme court of Illinois in People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 221, 16 Am. Rep. 528: "The respondents are correct in saying in their answers that they have a right to examine the proceedings of any and every department of the government. Far be it from us to deny that right. Such freedom of the press is indispensable to the preservation of the freedom of the people. But certainly neither these respondents nor any intelligent person connected with the press, and having a just idea of its responsibilities as well as its powers, will claim that it may seek to control the administration of justice, or influence the decision of pending causes. A court will, of course, endeavor to remain wholly uninfluenced by publications like that under consideration; but will the community believe that it is able to do so? Can it even be certain in regard to itself? Can men always be sure of their mental poise? A timid man might be influenced to yield, while a combative man would be driven in the opposite direction. Whether the actual influence is on one side or the other, so far as it is felt at all, it becomes dangerous to the administration of justice. Even if a court is happily composed of judges of such firm and equal temper that they remain wholly uninfluenced in either direction, nevertheless a disturbing element has been thrown into the council chamber, which it is the wise policy of the law to exclude. . . . It may be said that, as long as the court was conscious it had not been frightened from its propriety by the article in question, the wiser course would have been to pass it by in silence. So far as we are personally concerned, we should have preferred to do so. . . . But a majority of the court were of opinion that this publication could not be disregarded without infidelity to our duty. By our relations to the bar, to the suitors in our court, to the entire judiciary of the state, and to the state itself, we felt constrained to call the persons responsible for this publication to account." See also State, Haskell, v. Faulds, 17 Mont. 140; Re Hughes, 8 N. M. 225; People, Connor, v. Stapleton, 18 Colo. 568, 23 L. R. A. 787; Cooper v. People, Wyatt, 13 Colo. 337, 6 L. R. A. 430; Com. v. Dandridge, 2 Va. Cas. 414; State v. Frew, 24 W. Va. 416, 49 Am. Rep. 257. The last case cited is an exhaustive and thorough compilation of the American authorities upon the subject of contempt. The judiciary of this state was created by, and its jurisdiction and the specifications of its judicial functions written in, the Constitution. It receives its mandate from the sovereign people, and it is responsible to them for the faithful discharge of its trust. Its sole authority from them is to declare the law of the state, and by its process enforce that law; and it cannot make or revise any law. It can no more decline the exercise of rightful authority in the determination of a case presented to it than it can overstep its rightful authority in the assumption of arbitrary power. A timorous judiciary shrinking from a rightful declaration of the law is alike dangerous to civil rights and personal liberty with a corrupt and arbitrary one. As declared by the supreme court of Virginia in Com. v. Dandridge, 2 Va. Cas. 414, from the standpoint of able jurists: "They cannot but feel it a delicate and invidious task to define and decide upon the extent of their own powers, nor be ignorant that the judgment they are called upon to render may expose them, on the one hand, to the imputation of timidity and irresolution, or, on the other, to that of usurpation and tyranny. The verity of these suspicions would not be more unworthy of the judges than the fact of their shrinking from this question, because of the consequences in which themselves might be involved by it. . . . In this country, we know no privileges but such as exist for the public good. Many such privileges we have; from those which appertain to the legislature itself, even down to such as belong to the lowest executive officer. Those which surround the administration of justice belong to the same order. Courts, their officers and process, are shielded from invasion and insult, not from any imaginary sanctity in the institutions themselves, or the persons of those who compose them (as in the political and ecclesiastical establishments of another hemisphere), but solely for the purpose of giving them their due weight and authority, and to enable those who administer them to discharge their functions with impartiality, fidelity, and effect. This is the true test of every privilege not granted by statute, and is the spirit of everyone (not merely private) which is so secured."

The court in the case at bar has concluded that the publication made by the defendants, if published while the case of Bardsley v. Sternberg was pending here, under the facts above stated, is a contempt, under the laws of this state. In such conclusion it is not intended to intimate or suggest that any citizen of the state has not a legal right to comment upon, criticise, and freely, and without restriction from any lawful authority, discuss any cause determined by any of the courts of this state after the final disposition of such case; or that any restriction of fair and impartial reporting of cases pending in courts, unless forbidden by rule, is now imposed by our laws. The officers who compose the courts are selected by the people of the 43 L. R. A.

state for the discharge of their duties. The freest discussion of individual merits, capacity, and character is necessary for an intelligent exercise of suffrage in the election of judges, as of all other officers of the state. An action has been deemed pending in this court until the remittitur issued; but counsel have argued that, although the statute does not determine when jurisdiction ends in this court, yet the court, having been authorized by statute to frame rules, has, by its rules, determined the question of the conclusion of the case, and refers to rule 13 (11 Wash. 718): "(1) Every petition for rehearing must be filed within thirty days after the opinion shall have been rendered, and no more than one petition for a rehearing of the same question shall be filed: provided, that the court may, in its discretion, allow any petition to be amended. The filing of a petition for rehearing shall suspend the decision of the court until a ruling thereon." Elliott, Appellate Procedure, says (§ 558): "A second petition from the same party will not be considered." And that has been the practice in this court. The first opinion in the cause was followed by a petition for rehearing on the part of the appellant. Leave to print and file additional briefs was granted by the court, and the case assigned regularly, and reargued orally in the court, and the opinion of the majority of the court then filed, reversing the judgment of the superior court. A petition was then filed by counsel for respondent, praying for an important modification of the opinion filed, and subsequently an opinion filed denying such modification. There can be no doubt of the jurisdiction of this court over the cause and the power to make any modification of its opinion, until the final judgment was rendered, and until the remittitur issued. Under the law, the courts in this state are always in session, in legal contemplation. "An action is 'pending' . . . until the judgment is fully certified." Anderson, Law Dict. verb. Pend. See Ulschager v. Stewart, 71 Pa. 170; Holland v. Fox, 3 El. & Bl. 977; Wegman v. Childs, 41 N. Y. 159; Hayne, New Trial & Appeal, §§ 292, 293.

From an inspection of the article set out in the information, it can readily be perceived that, thrust into the court before its final deliberation and final expression in the cause of Bardsley v. Sternberg, it comes within all the authorities as tending to embarrass and disturb the conclusion of the tribunal in the determination of the cause pending before it.

In determining the punishment that the judgment of the court will affix to the contempt in this case, the court has taken into consideration that this is the first offense formally brought to its attention in the history of the state, and the maximum penalty affixed by the statute is reduced for that reason.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

John J. CARTER, Plff. in Err.,
v.

COUNTY COURT OF TYLER COUNTY.

(.....W. Va.....)

- *1. Where a party holds a lease upon land for oil and gas purposes, upon the usual terms and conditions, paying one eighth of the oil produced as royalty, the oil while it remains in situ must be regarded as realty, and as remaining the property of the lessor until brought to the surface.
2. The prospective production of oil from such well cannot be properly charged to the lessee, on the personal property books of the county.
3. Under chapter 29 of the Code, which provides for the assessment of taxes, the words, "personal property," as therein used, shall include all fixtures attached to the land, if not included in the valuation of such land entered in the proper land book.

(January 25, 1899.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Tyler County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the County Court refusing to correct an alleged erroneous assessment for taxation against petitioner as the owner of certain oil wells. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John H. McCoy and Robert McDoldowney, for plaintiff in error:

All property is classed for taxation as real and personal property. Real property is taxed on the land books, but a chattel real is personal estate.

Under the statute the words "personal property" include all fixtures attached to land not included in the valuation of such land on the land books.

Code, chap. 29, § 46.

Is an oil well part of the chattel real, that is, the oil lease, or a part of the realty?

The basis of the entire assessment is the estimated production of the wells for the period of one year. This certainly is not an assessment of personal property, because the property was not then in the possession of anyone separate and independent of the land over it.

An assessor cannot estimate the value of an oil well at any average future production of such well, or make such average production the basis of any production assessment.

The wells are drilled under and by virtue of mining leases, and they cannot be taxed as land separately from the surface of the land.

Only when the oil under the surface is owned by another person than the surface owner can it be taxed separately, for it is then freehold estate.

United States Coal, I. & Mfg. Co. v. Ran-

*Headnotes by ENGLISH, J.

NOTE.—The above case decides the somewhat peculiar question of the right to tax the interest of a lessee in an oil lease as personal property. That oil is to be regarded as real estate 43 L. R. A.

dolph County Ct. 38 W. Va. 201; State v. South Penn Oil Co. 42 W. Va. 102.

There is no authority under the laws of this state to tax leasehold interests for oil and gas purposes.

Mr. Anthony Smith for defendant in error.

English, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John J. Carter gave notice to the prosecuting attorney of Tyler county that on the 17th day of January, 1894, he would apply to the county court of said county, under §§ 94, 95, 96, and 97 of chapter 29 of the Code, for relief against an erroneous assessment on the personal property books of said county, in which he claimed he was erroneously charged with oil at a valuation of $81,000,—90 oil wells,—and that he would introduce evidence of such charge, and move said county court to enter an order granting him relief from such erroneous assessment. In pursuance of said notice, Carter presented his petition, specifying therein that he was assessed with 90 oil wells, at a valuation of $81,000, and with $72,000, as the value of capital used by him in his business, also setting forth therein the reasons why said assessments were illegal and erroneous. The prosecuting attorney objected to the consideration of so much of the applicant's petition as referred to the assessment of the item of $72,000, value of machinery, etc., as stated in column 18 of said personal property book, upon the ground that no notice of the intention of said petitioner had been given him that he would ask the court to be released from the payment of taxes upon said item, to which objection the petitioner replied generally. As to this objection the record shows that due notice of the said petition was given the prosecuting attorney, and that he appeared on behalf of the state, and objected to the consideration by the court of so much of the applicant's petition as refers to the assessment of the item of $72,000, value of machinery, etc., as stated in column 18, and agreed that the said petition be continued until the 6th of February, 1894, which had the effect of waiving the notice required by statute, the only object of which being that the interests of the state, county, and district might be represented in the matter. Now it appears that the sum of $72,000 was assessed upon the engines, boilers, rigs, and appurtenances, such as casing, etc., belonging to the 90 wells in the proceedings mentioned. This machinery and the appliances connected therewith were in use by the petitioner, Carter, in the production of oil from the wells he had leased; and, in determining whether this property was properly placed upon the personal property books of said county, we must determine whether they should be classed as realty or personalty.

I am not unaware of the diversity of opinion expressed by text writers, and the almost irreconcilable conflict of decisions by the different courts, which would necessarily be encountered in investigating the question as to when machinery and appliances used by tenants in the prosecution of the various industries and mining operations upon the lands of their lessors are to be considered personalty, and when realty; but we are spared the labor and perplexity attending this investigation by our statute, which provides (Code, chap. 29, § 46) that the "words 'personal property' as used in this chapter shall include all fixtures attached to land, if not included in the valuation of such land entered in the proper land book." The machinery and appliances about these 90 oil wells appear to have been assessed to the petitioner, Carter, at $800 each, or $72,000 for the whole. The question as to whether such assessment was excessive or not was a question of fact, which was passed upon by the county court after hearing testimony in behalf of both parties, the court finding that the property was not excessively valued for taxation. The evidence was certified, and the case appealed to the circuit court, and the finding of the county court was affirmed by that court; and, while there may be some slight conflict in the testimony as to the valuation of the property, this court would not undertake to disturb the finding of the county court, or to place a proper assessment of valuation on said property, especially when the county court was confronted with the witnesses and heard their testimony. The ruling of the county court and circuit court, therefore, as to this property being properly placed on the personal property book, and the assessment not being excessive as applied to the machinery and appliances, is affirmed.

The prosecuting attorney also objected to the consideration of an affidavit presented with said petition, made by one S. G. Pyle, who stated therein that in the spring of 1893 he assisted J. K. Smith, assessor of Tyler county, West Virginia, in making out said assessor's books, and extending levy on same, and that it was his information that the several oil wells in and about the town of Sistersville, consisting of rig, engine, boiler, casing, and other appurtenances thereto for the purpose of operating for oil, were assessed at $800 each respectively, for the purpose of taxation, and, in addition thereto, the several wells south of said town of Sistersville, Tyler county, aforesaid, within said county, producing petroleum oil, were assessed upon a production of 10 barrels per day from the 1st of April, 1893, for the said assessment year, beginning at 10 barrels on April 1, 1893, and running down to nothing on April 1, 1894, or an average of 10 barrels per day for six months, and fifteen days at an assessed value of 50 cents per barrel. The wells north of said town were assessed at a daily production of 15 barrels per day, on the same basis as the 10-barrel 43 L. R. A.

wells, at the same rate per barrel, and for the same length of time. Which objections of the prosecuting attorney were sustained, and thereupon the court proceeded to hear the evidence of said S. G. Pyle, which was reduced to writing, and signed by him, which fact makes it unnecessary for us to pass upon the propriety of the action of the court as to the exclusion of the affidavit of said Pyle.

The depositions of John Carter and other witnesses were taken in open court, and the petitioner, by his attorneys, moved the court to strike from said personal property book the entry of the assessments against Carter for the year 1893; which motion, being argued and considered by the court, was overruled, the court holding that said property was not excessively valued for taxation, and that it belongs on the property books. To this opinion of the court the petitioner, by his attorneys, excepted, and, on his motion, the court certified all the evidence taken in the case; and from these proceedings of said county court, on March 15, 1894, John J. Carter obtained an appeal to the circuit court of Tyler county. On the 15th of August, 1894, the appellant, John J. Carter, by his attorney, filed, with the papers of the cause, a copy of the entry of the personal property of said Carter on the property books of Tyler county for the year 1893; also forty-four copies of certain oil leases, deeds, and assignments of oil leases, which are copied in the record. On the 17th of December, 1894, said appeal was heard by the circuit court, and the judgment of the county court appealed from was affirmed, and from this judgment of the circuit court this writ of error was obtained.

Did the circuit court err in affirming the judgment of the county court, and thereby holding that the property of the plaintiff in error, consisting of the prospective product of 90 oil wells for the year 1893, was not excessively valued for taxation, and that the same was properly placed on the personal property books? In determining this question, it is proper that we should first consider the nature and character of the contract between the lessor and the lessee. One of the main features of the contract embodied in these leases is that the lessee shall put down the wells and bring the oil to the surface; and, when thus produced, the landlord is to have one eighth as rent or royalty, and the lessee seven eighths. While the oil remains in the cavities of the rocks in situ, this court has held, in Wilson v. Youst, 43 W. Va. 820, 30 L. R. A. 292, and Williamson v. Jones, 39 W. Va. 231, 25 L. R. A. 222, that it is part of the realty. The lessee may drill the well to the sand or rock in which the oil is contained; but the oil does not change its character from realty to personalty, or any portion of its ownership, until it is brought to the surface, and then seven eighths of it become the property of the lessee.

Can we say that the commissioner of the revenue of Tyler county, on the 1st of April, 1893, in assessing the prospective product of the 90 wells as the property of the lessee, John J. Carter, was right? While he was the owner of the wells that had been drilled in the rocks, they were merely the conduit through which the oil might be drawn to the surface, and he had the privilege of pumping it to the surface; but the oil in its place among the rocks was not his, and might possibly never be. See State v. South Penn Oil Co. 42 W. Va. 102. Again, it is part of the history of this oil territory that what might be a productive, playing well this week or this month may not be worth pumping next week or next month. Aside from all this, said Carter, on the 1st of April, 1893, was the owner of no oil, the product of the year commencing on that day; and he could not be assessed on property that he had not yet acquired, and it would be too speculative to assess him on property that he might thereafter acquire by future exertion. Now, the duty which the assessor attempted to perform in this instance is required by § 54 of chapter 29 of the Code, which provides that "it shall be the duty of the assessor, as soon as possible after the 1st day of April in each year, to ascertain all personal property subject to taxation in his district with the value thereof and the name of the person to whom the same ought to be assessed, and to make proper entry thereof in his personal property book." If the assessor, in pursuance of this statute, had gone to John J. Carter on the 1st day of April, 1893, and required him to return a list of his personal property under oath, he surely could not have returned one gallon of oil as the prospective product of said 90 wells for the year commencing April 1, 1893, and ending April 1, 1894, for the plain reason that no portion of the oil underlying his leases, while it remained beneath the surface, was his property. Section 40 of chapter 29 of the Code provides that "as to real property the person who by himself or his tenant has the freehold in his possession, whether in fee or for life, shall be deemed the owner for the purpose of taxation." See also, opinion of Holt, J., in State v. South Penn Oil Co. 42 W. Va. 102, and United States Coal, I. & Mfg. Co. v. Randolph County Ct. 38 W. Va. 201 (Syl. point 2). We are not, however, required to pass on the question as to what party should be assessed with the oil in situ in this case, but do hold that it is not assessable as personalty. I therefore hold that the assessor of Tyler county improperly placed upon the personal property books of said county, as the property of said John J. Carter, 90 oil wells, valued for the year commencing April 1, 1893, at $87,750, and that the county court erroneously held that said property belongs on the personal property books. I am further of opinion that the circuit court erred in affirming the judgment of said county court.

The judgment complained of is therefore reversed so far as it holds that said Carter was properly assessed with the item of $87,750 as the prospective product of said 90 wells as personal property.

STATE of West Virginia
v.

George W. SPONAUGLE et al.,

CONDON-LANE BOOM & LUMBER COMPANY, Appt.

(.....W. Va.....)

- *1. That clause of § 6, art. 13, of the state Constitution, forfeiting land for the failure of the owner to enter it for taxation, is not in violation of that clause of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution restraining states from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.
2. The 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution does not itself define "due process of law." What was such before its adoption continues such. It does not prohibit a state from future, new legislation, action, or proceedings necessary, in its judgment, in the administration of its government, so it bear alike on all similarly circumstanced, and be not unusual, oppressive, or arbitrary action, assailing the essential rights of the person.
3. Due process of law does not always require judicial hearing. It does in matters of purely judicial nature, but not in matters of taxation or matters purely administrative.
4. It is with the Supreme Court of the United States to determine finally whether legislation or action under state authority is due process of law.
5. What is due process of law?
6. Laches will not bar a landowner from assailing a tax sale of his land, when there is no actual possession under the tax title.
7. Laches is not imputable to the state. Statutes of limitation now run against the state.
8. A sale of land for taxes is without warranty by the state, and it is not prevented thereby from setting up its right under forfeiture for omission to enter the land for taxes either before or after the tax sale.
9. If a sale for taxes is made, and the tax purchaser pays taxes thereafter, the receipt of such taxes will not operate, on the theory of estoppel in pais by conduct, to prevent the state from setting up against the tax purchaser a title to land, by forfeiture, for failure of the former owner to enter it for taxation subsequent to or before the tax sale. If the tax title be valid, it would prevent such forfeiture for taxes after the tax sale from its own force, not on the theory of estoppel.
10. A sale of land for taxes, valid to pass title of the owner, will prevent its forfeiture for failure to enter it for taxes in the name of the former owner for years subsequent to the tax sale.

11. An omission, in a list of sales of land for taxes, to state the estate of the owner, will not annul the tax deed.

(November 30, 1898.)

APPPEAL by intervening defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Randolph County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce a tax title to certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank Woods for appellant.

Mr. C. H. Scott, for the State:

If the tax deed is invalid, it was so from its inception, conveyed no title from the owner to the grantee thereunder, and could have proved no impediment to the forfeiture of the owner's title for nonentry for taxation in his name.

If void the deed may be so declared and set aside in this suit both as against the state and petitioner, Cunningham, so far as the same may be in conflict with the owner's right to redeem the owner's title, or remain a cloud upon it after redemption.

Acts 1873, chap. 24, § 18.

By the express provisions of the law the court is confined in the adjudication of conflicting claims to the time when the title was forfeited which the state is proceeding to sell.

The claimants under the tax deed are not within the purview of art. 13, § 3; of the Constitution, and therefore in no manner acquired the title of the state.

The owner while the title is reposing in the state, under no rule of law or equity, can be required to the exercise of diligence on his part for the protection and preservation of his title, because it has by the operation of law passed from him and he is left without a remedy to either compel its restoration or to antagonize conflicting claims of an individual character in the court of the land. He must await the bringing of a suit by the state; he cannot take the initiative.

There were irregularities in the sale of delinquent lands in pursuance of which the deed in question was made.

The power to sell lands for the nonpayment of taxes is not a common-law power, but arises strictly from statute, and therefore exists only when the conditions of the statute are fulfilled.

1 Blackwell, Tax Titles, §§ 126, 127, note.

The omission in the report of the sheriff of lands sold for nonpayment of taxes to state what estate was held therein as required by § 12, chap. 31, of the Code, vitiates a sale under the said chapter.

Jones v. Dils, 18 W. Va. 764; Barton v. Gilchrist, 19 W. Va. 230; Wakeman v. Thompson, 32 W. Va. Appx. 1.

The failure of the report of the sheriff to show in whose name the land in controversy was taxed was not a mere irregularity.

Dequasie v. Harris, 16 W. Va. 345.

The oath of the sheriff, appended to his list of sales returned to the recorder, is informal, ambiguous, and therefore invalid.

The titles of Jacob Sponaugle and the tax-deed claimant, under the law, being in open hostility to each other since the creation of the deed, the payment of taxes by the holder under the tax deed in his name did not inure to the benefit of the original owner to protect his title from forfeiture, and cannot estop the state in this proceeding.

Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 684; McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 581.

Messrs. Flick & Westenhaver, for E. A. Cunningham:

The validity of facts touching the assessment, levy, and delinquency of taxes is determined under the law in force at the time they were made, and the tax sale is also governed by the law in force when it was made.

The affidavit to the list of sales is not in conformity to the present law, in that the sheriff does not say that he has not heretofore been interested in this sale. Such an omission renders void a sale and tax deed even after it is made and recorded.

Phillips v. Mincar, 40 W. Va. 58.

If the void character of the sale appears from the deed itself, a suit to set aside the sale cannot be maintained.

Where the validity of a deed depends upon acts in pais, a party claiming under it is bound to prove affirmatively the performance of those acts; in the case of a naked power not coupled with an interest the law requires that every prerequisite to the exercise of such power shall exist and precede it; the claimant under a tax sale, being one made to enforce a forfeiture, must show that the law has been rigidly and exactly complied with; the recitals in the deed of the officer making the sale for taxes are not even prima facie evidence of the regularity of his proceedings, or of the existence of the facts thus recited, but proof aliunde must be furnished.

Brannon, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a chancery suit in the circuit court of Randolph county, in the name of the state, against Sponaugle and others, to sell a tract of 1,200 acres of land patented by Virginia to Jacob Sponaugle in 1852, the state claiming title by reason of forfeiture of the land to the state because of its omission from the tax books for five successive years subsequent to 1872. Jacob Sponaugle conveyed the land to his children, and they were made defendants, as also E. A. Cunningham, who claimed interests in the land by purchase from some of them. The answer of the children of Sponaugle admitted the forfeiture and the liability to sale. Cunningham filed a petition setting up his interest, admitting the forfeiture, and asking to be allowed to redeem the land. This petition and cross bill attacked and sought to set aside a tax deed, and title under it, of the Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company. This company was made a defendant to the state's bill, as claiming title to the land; alleging that its claim was void and ineffectual against the state's title under the forfeiture, and that the land was liable to sale under its title by forfeiture. The Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company demurred to the bill, and answered, setting up that its claim to the land was based on a sale to Cresap in 1871 for taxes for years prior thereto delinquent in the name of Jacob Sponaugle, which tax title had come by conveyance to it, and that this sale rendered the land not taxable after 1871 to Sponaugle, but to Cresap and those claiming under him, and that taxes had been charged and paid in their names for the years in which it was omitted in Sponaugle's name, and for which the forfeiture was alleged to exist. It claimed that, if the land was forfeited, it took the benefit of the forfeited title, by reason of alleged possession under the color and claim of title arising from said tax deed and payment of taxes. The decree held the land forfeited, that the lumber company had no title, that its tax title was void, and allowed Cunningham and others claiming interests under Sponaugle to redeem from the forfeiture. The lumber company appeals.

The demurrer and answer of the lumber company challenge the title of the state as conferred by forfeiture, and assert that it has no title under which to attack said company, and is not entitled to sell the land; and this on the theory that § 6, art. 13, of the West Virginia Constitution is repugnant to article 14 of Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, in its provision, "nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." If this is so, the state has no title to the land. No definite definition—none but the most general—has been or can be given of "due process of law." The best the courts can do is to say, in each case as it arises, whether a given act or proceeding in the particular matter is due process of law. It depends how the question arises; that is, upon the matter or transaction involved. Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616. What would be due process if done under the police power or taxing power might not be, in many cases would not be, if not done under either of those powers. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 714. A horse may be lawfully seized and sold, without judge or jury, for taxes; but an individual or officer or court or legislature, without trial, generally could not do this. In Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616, Justice Bradley said: "In judging what is 'due process of law,' respect must be had to the cause and object of the taking, whether under the taxing power, the power of eminent domain, or the power of assessment for local improvements, or none of these; and, if found to be suitable or admissible in the special case, it will be adjudged to be 'due process of law,' but, if found to be arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, it may be declared to be not 'due process of law.'" The clause of the state Constitution in question makes it the duty of the landowner to put his land on the tax books, and provides that "when for any five successive years after the year 1869, the owner of any tract of land containing 1000 acres or more shall not have been charged on such books with state tax on said land, then, by operation hereof, the land shall be forfeited and the title thereto vest in the state." This provision is to be justified under the taxing power of the state, and I think, also under the police power. Its purpose was to raise revenue from vast quantities of land which had been persistently and intentionally omitted by the owners for years from the tax books, and escaped all taxation. What is the limit of the taxing power, except by express provision of the Constitution? It scarcely has any. It is so nearly unlimited from sheer necessity. It involves the operations, nay, the very existence, of government. It is an original power, inherent in every government. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 581, does not lay it down too broadly as follows: "The power to impose taxes is one so unlimited in force, and so searching in extent, that the courts scarcely venture to declare that it is subject to any restrictions whatever, except such as rest in the discretion of the authority which exercises it. It reaches to every trade or occupation; to every object of industry, use, or enjoyment; to every species of possession; and it imposes a burden, which, in case of failure to discharge it, may be followed by seizure and sale or consecration of property. No attribute of sovereignty is more pervading and at no point does the power of the government affect more constantly and intimately all the relations of life than through the exactions made under it." "The basis of all taxation is political necessity; without taxes, there can be no revenue; without revenue there can be no regular government. . . . All subjects over which the sovereign power of a state extends are objects of taxation." Burroughs, Taxn. pp. 1, 3. Justice Field said in State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 319, 21 L. ed. 186: "It may touch property in every shape, in its natural condition, in its manufactured form, and in its varied transmigrations. . . . It may touch business in the almost infinite forms in which it is conducted,—in professions, in commerce, in manufactures, and in transportation. Unless restrained by provisions of the Federal Constitution, the power of the state as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation is unlimited." In Witherspoon v. Duncan, 4 Wall. 210, 18 L. ed. 339, the Supreme Court held that the "states, as a general rule, have the right of determining the manner of levying and collecting taxes on private property."

The states succeeded to the power of taxation of the English Parliament after the Revolution, and possess it yet; and we must find in the Federal Constitution a plain—very plain—prohibition, to restrain this sovereign power, indispensable for our most numerous wants. From quotations above, we see that the state may fasten taxes upon any subject of property. Virginia, very long before the 14th Amendment, adopted and steadily pursued the policy of holding the land itself liable for its taxes. By frequent acts she directed sale of land for taxes charged and unpaid. Acts of November, 1781; May, 1782; October, 1782; January 7, 1783; December 27, 1790; December 20, 1791; December 13, 1792; February 9, 1814; March 10, 1832; February 27, 1835, 1843; Code 1849; Act 1850. By some acts she forfeited lands charged with taxes not paid. Acts of December 27, 1790; December 13, 1792; January 29, 1803; January 20, 1807; April 1, 1831. Acts were passed forfeiting lands not entered on the tax books. Acts of February 5, 1810, and February 27, 1835. Many acts were passed from time to time, through years, giving further time to enter the lands omitted from the tax books, and to redeem lands charged with unpaid taxes. I refer to these many acts running through so many years to show a persistent, fixed policy of Virginia, in one mode and another, to hold the land itself amenable to taxes. West Virginia, since its birth, before the Fourteenth Amendment, pursued this policy, by adopting the Virginia law for the sale of lands for taxes, and after that amendment by her provision for such sale in her Code of 1868, and by the act of March 4, 1869, forfeiting land for nonentry for taxation. Thus, in Virginia and West Virginia these several modes of holding lands liable had become the "law of the land," as to this matter, before the amendment. Did that amendment come to overthrow this long-established law of the land? That amendment came to defend existing personal rights against unusual, arbitrary action of the states; to save the citizen his essential rights against the exercise of unwonted, unusual, arbitrary, and unequal power by the state, operating to prejudice him in such essential rights; but I cannot think that it came to defend him against the exercise by the state of its usual powers, under its fixed policy, in a governmental function so indispensable as the collection of revenue. The authorities show that the state can select its subjects of taxation, and select its mode of enforcement and collection. It can distrain personal property and sell it. It can sell realty. Why may it not impose forfeiture, if it deem that a necessary means of getting its revenue? This was "due process of law" of Virginia in this matter of taxation, and complies with the demand of the 14th Amendment. A drastic remedy it is, and yet can you say that it is not warranted by that immense power of taxation? Coke's old definition of "law of the land" says that it is that which is according to the "old law of the land." 2 Inst. 50. "Tax laws are laws of the land, and tax proceedings conducted under equal and uniform laws are due process of law." Bardwell v. Collins, 20 Am. St. Rep. 554, note (44 Minn. 97, 9 L. R. A. 152). "Proceedings by which taxes have been assessed, levied, and collected from the citizen have always been regarded as administrative, and not judicial in their character, and to constitute due process of law, within the meaning of the Constitution. Such proceedings have, from necessity, been exercised by governments, during all times, by summary methods of procedure. . . . These methods were in exercise and existence long before the adoption of the Constitution, and have never been supposed to be affected thereby." Ruger, Ch. J., in McMahon v. Palmer, 102 N. Y. 176, 55 Am. Rep. 796. When that case went to the United States Supreme Court, the opinion said (what is apt in this case): "That law had been in existence over forty years at the time of this proceeding. We do not regard the collection in this way, founded on necessity, and so long recognized by the state of New York as to be justifiably resorted to under the circumstances detailed in the act, and operating alike on all persons and property similarly situated, as within the inhibitions of the 14th Amendment." Palmer v. McMahon, 133 U. S. 660, 33 L. ed. 772. A tax act is "law of the land, not merely in so far as it lays down a general rule to be observed, but in all the proceedings and all the process which it points out or provides for in order to give the rule full operation. . . . The mode of levying . . . is completely and exclusively within the legislative power." Cooley, Taxn. p. 39. The author there shows that the Constitution does not restrict this power under the due process clause. Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 26 L. ed. 658. The landlord under his distress, the sheriff under his tax bill, seize and sell personalty without judicial process, and the sheriff sells land for taxes without it. Why, since the amendment, is this not unconstitutional? Because those procedures have been settled procedures under the law of the land, and are due process of law in those particular matters. So is the remedy of forfeiture adopted by the state to collect its land tax. 43 L. R. A.

Is such procedure necessary? That is for the state to say. But forfeiture divests the owner of title. So does the distress for rent or taxes divest the owner of personal property. It is only another mode of divestiture. It is claimed that there must be a judicial inquiry to find the fact working forfeiture and declaring the forfeiture. This is so in judicial proceedings, but not in administrative, summary proceedings. This cannot be demanded, unless you say that it is demanded by this particular mode of enforcing taxes,—forfeiture,—and not to sales or other modes; for it is undeniable that no law demands it in proceedings to collect taxes. Mr. Justice Harlan sustains this position in King v. Mullins, 171 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 214, and cites Den, Murray, v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 18 How. 272, 15 L. ed. 372, in which was considered the case where a distress warrant was issued, under an act of Congress, by the solicitor of the treasury against a defaulting collector of customs, and the question was whether it was due process of law; and the court said: "Tested by the common statute and law of England prior to the emigration of our ancestors, and by the laws of many of the states at the time of the adoption of this amendment [fifth], the proceeding authorized by the act of 1820 cannot be denied to be due process of law, when applied to the ascertainment and recovery of balances due the government from a collector of customs, unless there exists in the Constitution some other provision which restrains Congress from authorizing such proceedings; for, though 'due process of law' generally implies and includes actor, reus, judex, regular allegations, opportunity to answer and a trial according to some settled course of judicial proceedings [citing cases], yet this is not universally true. There may be, and we have seen that there are, cases, under the law of England after Magna Charta, and as it was brought to this country and acted on here, in which process, in its nature final, issues against the body, lands, and goods of certain public debtors without any such trial. . . . The power to collect and disburse revenue, and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying that power into effect, includes all known and appropriate means of effectually collecting and disbursing that revenue, unless some such means should be forbidden in some other part of the Constitution. . . . It may be added that probably there are few governments which do or can permit their claims for public taxes either on the citizen or the officer employed for their collection or disbursement to become subjects of judicial controversy according to the course of the law of the land. Imperative necessity has forced a distinction between such claims and all others, which has sometimes been carried out by summary methods of proceeding, and sometimes by systems of fines and penalties, but always in some way observed and yielded to." Justice Harlan cites Ball's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U. S. 232, 33 L. ed. 892, holding that: "Process of taxation does not require the same kind of notice as is required in a suit at law, or even in proceedings for taking private property under the power of eminent domain. It involves no violation of due process of law, when it is executed according to customary forms and established usage." And Justice Harlan added: "This must be so, else the existence of government might be put in peril by the delays attendant upon formal judicial proceedings for the collection of taxes." So great is this taxing power, that in Com. v. Byrne, 20 Gratt. 165, a man was arrested and imprisoned under a mere license certificate issued by a commissioner of the revenue, on failure to pay the license tax as a distiller. He was held to be lawfully imprisoned, and it was said that his imprisonment did not violate the requirement of due process of law. Judge Moncre sustained it in an able opinion. The case of Wulzen v. San Francisco City & County Supers, 101 Cal. 15, aptly expresses the idea I would impress as to the effect of legislation of Virginia through so many years in the matter of land taxation. That case says: Taxes are not, as a general rule, collected by judicial proceedings; and the procedure resorted to for their imposition and collection may properly be regarded as due process of law, if it conforms to customary usages. The great opinion of Justice Curtis in Den, Murray, v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 18 How. 279, 15 L. ed. 375, strongly sustains this view: "This legislative construction of the Constitution, commencing so early in the government, when the first occasion for this manner of proceeding arose, continued throughout its existence, and, repeatedly acted on by the judiciary and executive, is entitled to no inconsiderable weight upon the question whether the proceeding adopted by it was 'due process of law.'" In Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616, it is held: "This court has heretofore decided that due process of law does not in all cases require a resort to a court of justice to assert the rights of the public against the individual, or to impose burdens upon his property for the public use. Den, Murray, v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 18 How. 272, 15 L. ed. 372, and McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37, 24 L. ed. 335." See Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321, 29 L. ed. 414. If there is anything settled by the United States Supreme Court, it is that the requirement of due process of law does not always require judicial procedure. Justice Miller said, in Davidson v. New Orleans, that the 5th Amendment, restraining the exercise of power under Federal authority without due process of law, though nearly a century old, had scarcely ever been invoked, whereas, the 14th Amendment, adopted in 1866, had filled the docket of the Supreme Court with cases asking that court to overthrow judgments and legislation of states; that there is abundance of evidence that there exists a "strange misconception of the scope of this provision as found in the 14th Amendment;" and that it seems every unsuccessful litigant in a state court has made it the means of bringing his abstract opinions of the justice of state decisions and the merits of state legislation before the Supreme Court. He ridiculed such a construction of the amendment. So have other justices of that court. What is this amendment? Except as a limitation upon state action, it is not new, as respects the demand of "due process of law." That is simply a new application. It only demands of the states what Magna Charta demanded from the time our English ancestors set foot on American soil, and was in the Constitutions of all the states. For the first time that amendment gave the national government a veto power upon state action upon the citizen not consonant with due process of law, but it gave no new definition of the term "due process of law," or its equivalent, "law of the land." Before it, the state had final right to say whether the act was due process; after it, the supreme court has. That is all. The definition is the same. Eames v. Savage, 77 Me. 212, 52 Am. Rep. 757. The amendment does not say what due process is. If it had long been established as such in the state, it is due process under the amendment. Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 78, 21 L. ed. 409. Legislation, action, and procedure long used by the state as usual or customary in the given case were not at once swept away because not attended with judicial inquiry. Nor does this amendment cramp the states so as to forbid the adoption of new legislation, action, or procedure which they may deem necessary, wise, and politic in the administration of government. In either case, so it do not assail the essential right of the citizen under the principles of common equal justice, it is valid under this amendment. Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 537, 28 L. ed. 239, where a new Constitution dispensed with an indictment for murder, and allowed its trial on information. The opinion says: "However exceptional it [proceeding] may be, as tested by definitions and principles of ordinary procedure, nevertheless this, in substance, has been immemorially the actual law of the land, and therefore is due process of law." This constitutional law, state and Federal, I repeat, is old, and its definition the same at all times; and yet legislation and procedure under state authority, and Federal too, levying taxes, seizing and selling personal and real estate for taxes, personal for rent, seizing and confiscating personality under the police power, and even selling a defaulting customs receiver's property under a warrant issued by an executive officer for a debt arising from his collection of tariff, and imprisonment under a mere license tax bill, have not been discovered to be without due process. The 14th Amendment is highly salutary as a part of the Federal Constitution, properly construed and applied, as it has been thus far by that eminent tribunal, the Supreme Court of the United States; but it cannot be given the scope often claimed for it, practically denying to the states powers highly essential in the administration of the government. This construction has been several times repudiated by the Supreme Court.

How has this question of forfeiture for taxes been regarded by the Virginia courts? They have been unable to discover that it is not due process of law. It is true that in Kinney v. Beverley, 2 Hen. & M. 318, where the act of 1790 which provided that lands on which taxes should not be paid for three years "shall be lost, forfeited, and vested in the commonwealth." Judge Tucker did express the opinion that, without office found, the state could not take title, as it was only by record the King could take title; not definitely saying the act was invalid. Judge Roane (than whom no one has a higher name among Virginia jurists) said, "I cannot for a moment doubt the power of the legislature to pass the law in question;" and he said that no inquest of office was necessary, and that such a construction would defeat collection of revenue. Judge Green's opinion does not mention the subject. So this case cannot be quoted (as it is sometimes) as against the validity of forfeiture acts, as it was decided on other points. In Wild v. Serpell, 10 Gratt. 405, it was held that "the statutes of Virginia forfeiting land to the commonwealth for the failure of the owners to enter them upon the commissioner's books and pay the taxes due thereon are constitutional," and that title vested under them in the state without judgment, decree, or inquest of office. Several cases uphold the statute. Staats v. Board, 10 Gratt. 400; Levasser v. Washburn, 11 Gratt. 572; Smith v. Chapman, 10 Gratt. 445; Hale v. Branscum, 10 Gratt. 418; Usher v. Pride, 15 Gratt. 190. These cases are unsatisfactory, in not discussing the matter; but they do decide it, though in but one was it expressly mentioned. In Armstrong v. Morrill, 14 Wall. 120, 20 L. ed. 765, the constitutional point was not discussed, but the Virginia forfeiture acts were recognized as operative. So it was settled in Virginia. In West Virginia, our courts, in many decisions, have recognized the Virginia decisions as binding authority. Twigg v. Chevallic, 4 W. Va. 463; Smith v. Tharp, 17 W. Va. 221. And this state adopted this forfeiture policy as her only weapon, as shown by long experience, to compel payment of taxes on vast areas of wild, unseated land, by an act in 1869, and in 1872 by the Constitution containing the forfeiture clause in question, and by several later acts to enforce it. Several decisions recognize the validity of these laws, not by express decisions on the constitutional point, as our courts and bar treated the Virginia cases, and our cases in 4 and 17 W. Va. as settling it under the doctrine of stare decisis, but by recognizing these laws as binding law. McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 581; Auvil v. Lueger, 24 W. Va. 593; McClure v. Mauperture, 29 W. Va. 633; Tebbetts v. Charleston, 33 W. Va. 705; Hays v. Camden, 38 W. Va. 109; Wiant v. Hays, 38 W. Va. 68, 23 L. R. A. 82; Holly River Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489. Judge Goff, in the United States circuit court for West Virginia, held this clause of our Constitution valid in King v. Mullins. Titles to thousands upon thousands of acres, the homes of our people, rest upon this long line of enactment and decision; and for this court to reverse so many cases, and annul the constitutional provision, would shake those titles, and turn thousands from their homes. The rule of stare decisis binds us to adhere to them, especially as titles to property rest on those decisions. Not to do so would spread disaster, the extent of which would be appalling. And this is a consideration justly and deeply entering into the question, as the United States Supreme Court said, speaking through Justice Harlan, in King v. Mullins, decided in 1898. That court unanimously affirmed Judge Goff's decision holding valid the clause of the Constitution in question. I shall not say that the opinion holds that clause, taken alone, valid, though it virtually does so. The opinion holds that as, in connection with the state Constitution, the statutes to sell land as forfeited give the owner a hearing, "there is no ground for him to complain that his property has been taken without due process of law." In Read v. Dingess, 8 U. S. App. 526, 60 Fed. Rep. 21, 8 C. C. A. 389, it was held by the circuit court of appeals (fourth circuit) that the clause of the West Virginia Constitution was not against the 14th Amendment. Judge Goff holds the same in Van Gunden v. Virginia Coal & I. Co. 8 U. S. App. 229, 52 Fed. Rep. 851, 3 C. C. A. 294. Another element in this question is not to be overlooked. The state Constitution (§ 4, art. 13) provides for a sale of the forfeited land, and, by § 5, gives the owner the excess of its proceeds after paying taxes. This relieves the forfeiture clause from the charge of being arbitrary spoliation and confiscation of property; gives to it the hue of being only a step necessary to collect the taxes, showing that after that the state regards his right by holding in trust for him. I therefore reach the conclusion that this forfeiture clause is not repugnant to the 14th Amendment.

A point that is pressed against the state Constitution is that it, ipso facto, divests the owner of his title, and vests it in the state, without judicial inquiry,—without what is called "office found" at common law. If this is so, it is within the power of the state, under the tax power, to do so. "A legislative act directing the possession and appropriation of the land is equivalent to office found. The mode of asserting or of assuming the forfeited grant is subject to the legislative authority of the government. It may be after a judicial investigation, or by taking possession directly under the authority of the government, without these preliminary proceedings." United States v. Repentigny, 5 Wall. 267, 268, 18 L. ed. 645, 646. Can it, indeed, be said that the owner has irretrievably lost his land, without a hearing to contest the forfeiture? It is beyond doubt that the state has power to forfeit land, and vest title in itself, for delinquency or nonentry for taxes, if it leave a door open for hearing. If the Constitution had declared a forfeiture, and expressly given a hearing, no question could arise. It has declared a forfeiture, and has not shut the door against the owner to contest it. It simply declares that, if a fact exist, forfeiture ensues, as a legal consequence. It only says that a certain offense shall involve a certain penalty. All criminal or penal laws do this, but final conviction and penalty are to come after trial. It seems to me, we cannot consider the clause invalid, when privilege of contestation is not denied. Under the law before the act of 1882, a decree in a proceeding to sell land as forfeited was, while conclusive upon strangers, only prima facie evidence of forfeiture as against the owner. Holly River Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489; Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 257. In fact, Twigg v. Chevallie, 4 W. Va. 463, holds the jurisdiction as limited and special, and based only on forfeiture; and, if the land was not in fact forfeited, the decree would be void. It is perhaps immaterial whether prima facie or not, it surely not being conclusive. So, when the owner's title is in any way assailed, he can deny the forfeiture. It may be questioned whether the party claiming under the forfeiture must not show it as an original proposition, as the owner was no party. The forfeiting provision does not give the state or a third party taking title possession, but merely vests title, if forfeited. When sued by them, he can contest the forfeiture. If the state could, she has not enacted that he shall be ousted by force; and, therefore, if she or her purchaser desire possession, they must sue, and he can defend, or he can sue the state's tenant or purchaser in possession. This seems from authority, adequate hearing, if any were required. How is the party prejudiced? Where the door was open to a taxpayer to enjoin, though a bond were necessary, it did not render an act giving a right to levy a tax not due process. McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37, 24 L. ed. 335. Justice Miller said that as he could sue to recover back the money, as an illegal tax, that would free it from the charge of being without due process. In Newark & S. O. Horse Car R. Co. v. Hunt, 50 N. J. L. 308, there were statutes providing for the destruction of diseased horses; and the court held that these acts are within the police power of the state, and, further: "They are not within the prohibition of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, because, although they authorize the abatement of such nuisances in advance of a judicial adjudication of the fact of nuisance, yet they do not make the determination of the officials as to that fact conclusive, and only permit their acts in abating the nuisance to be justified by proof of the actual existence of such nuisance." Plaintiff, however, contends that the determination of the officials that the prescribed disease exists is to be made without notice to the property owners and without affording them an opportunity to be heard, and on this ground claims that these acts are obnoxious to the constitutional provision invoked. If the legislature by these acts has made the determination of these officials as to the existence of the common nuisance a conclusive adjudication upon the rights of the property owner, then it is perfectly obvious that this legislation cannot be supported. It has been settled in this state that it is not within the power of legislation to impart to a determination of this sort a conclusive character, as against the property owner, and legislation intending that result was held to be futile. Hutton v. Camden, 39 N. J. L. 122. An examination of the acts in question clearly shows that there was no intent in the legislative mind to make the conclusions of the officials decisive of the right of the property owner as to the existence of that condition of things which these acts declared would constitute in these cases a common nuisance, and would justify its abatement by the destruction of the animals diseased. The right of the property owner is not thereby barred, on the one hand, nor is the justification of the officials made effective, on the other hand, by reason of their adjudication, but by reason of the fact that the common nuisance declared by the acts existed, and so existed as to permit the officials to exercise the power of abatement. What the acts authorize is the abatement of an actual nuisance. They afford no protection to any invasion of the rights of property in any other case." The court says, in conclusion: "But if the property owner is not deprived of a right to contest the existence of such conditions, and to obtain redress, as for a trespass, if they are not shown to have existed, such legislative acts would not infringe any constitutional provision." So, in Lacton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 142, 38 L. ed. 390, where a statute authorized officers to destroy nets used in violation of the statute, without any judicial proceedings to ascertain the fact of such violation, the court says: "Nor is a person whose property is seized under the act in question without his legal remedy. If in fact his property has been used in violation of the act, he has no just reason to complain. If not, he may replevy his nets from the officer seizing them, or, if they have been destroyed, may have his action for their value. In such cases the burden would be upon the defendant to prove a justification under the statute." In Read v. Dingess, 8 U. S. App. 526, 60 Fed. Rep. 27, 8 C. C. A. 395, the court said: "But if the act, in every case of its commission, involves the forfeiture, nothing remains but to ascertain the fact of its commission, and that can as well be done in a subsequent suit involving the title as by a proceeding brought by the state to enforce the forfeiture." Also, New York Health Dept. v. Trinity Church, 145 N. Y. 32, 27 L. R. A. 710; and People, Copcutt, v. Yonkers Bd. of Health, 140 N. Y. 23, 23 L. R. A. 481; Branson v. Gee, 25 Or. 402, 24 L. R. A. 355. Statutes of limitation take land from one man and vest it in another. Why does no one claim that they violate the Constitution? I suppose, because they allow him a hearing afterwards. And the acts of 1872-73, providing for selling the land, gave him right to redeem his land, and so to pay what he justly owed the state. But since the act of 1882, and especially under that of 1893, for the sale of forfeited land, the proceeding is a regular chancery suit,—must be such,—and the owner must be a party, and is entitled to make full defense against the forfeiture; and surely this is a full hearing before decree, and satisfies the demand for “due process of law.” Under the latter statute (Acts 1893, chap. 24), this proceeding was had. It was held by the United States Supreme Court in King v. Mullins (1898) that, taking the clause of the Constitution and statute of 1882 in connection, the demand of the 14th Amendment was satisfied, and the proceeding valid. That is our adequate defense for this decision. I am myself now free from doubt as to the correctness of our holding on this question.

It is claimed that the state is prevented by laches from assailing the tax deed under the tax sale to Cresap in 1871, twenty-two years having passed from the tax deed to the date of this suit. No possession was ever held under the tax deed. The express statute of limitations did not, therefore, bar the state, and laches does not. Where the adverse claimant of land has no actual possession, the other claimant need not sue. Until then it is mere cloud, never maturing as title. Battin v. Woods, 27 W. Va. 58. Delay in bringing suit to annul a tax deed is not imputable as laches to the owner. United States v. Insley, 130 U. S. 263, 32 L. ed. 968; Cook v. Lasher, 42 U. S. App. 42, 73 Fed. Rep. 701, 19 C. C. A. 654; Sommers v. Ward, 41 W. Va. 80. The statute of limitations does not, at common law, apply to the state. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 322. Our statute now applies limitations to the state, like individuals. Code 1891, chap. 35, § 20. But no statute applies laches to the state, and the common-law rule says that it does not apply to it. 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1st ed. p. 56.

It is further raised, as a question, that as the state sold to Cresap for taxes, and collected taxes for years from those claiming under that title, it is estopped by this conduct from claiming forfeiture for nonentry in Sponaugle's name in after years,—the very years which the owners under the tax sale were paying taxes for. Now, as the state at a tax sale sells, not her own land, but only such title as the taxed party has, and by her sale and deed makes no warranty whatever, this estoppel cannot be maintained. And the forfeiture alleged accrued several years after this sale. Camden v. Alkire, 24 W. Va. 681. An estoppel in pais against the state from asserting a title to escheated land is not made out by assessment of taxes, and sale and conveyance for taxes, and the assessment and collection of taxes from the purchaser at the tax sale. An auditor's deed made in consummation of a sale for taxes cannot bar the assertion by the state of any claim or right to the land. The court says the deed is without warranty, and has not, as an estoppel, the force which a quitclaim deed has to pass title in the grantor at its date. Reid v. State, Thompson, 74 Ind. 252, 260. If it is contended that payment by the tax purchasers of taxes under their title paid the taxes on the land, so that it may be said to the state, “You have already gotten tax once on the land, and you cannot enforce a forfeiture for taxes for the same years in the name of the original owner, whose title we got by the tax sale, we having acquired the land under his title,” the response is: “That is so if your tax deed is valid, because there was no title left in the original owner to be taxed, but not so if your tax title is void. If valid, you defeat forfeiture by superiority of your tax title, not by estoppel from conduct, as it does not bind the state in this matter; but, if void, the title was left in the old owner, to be forfeited for taxes, and the state is not bound merely by conduct.” And, as to double taxation, Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 680, holds that there is no privity between former owner and tax purchaser, their claims being hostile, and payment by the tax purchaser does not discharge the state demand for taxes against the former owner, if lawful demand she had against his title as yet good; and, if he wants to deny the validity of the tax sale and keep his title good, he must still keep the land on in his name, just as in case of two stranger titles.

I come, in conclusion, to a very important question: Is the tax sale to Cresap efficient to pass title? It is alleged to be void because of irregularity in the sale lists apparent. If void, leaving title in Sponaugle, the state acquired title by forfeiture; but, if valid, it divested Sponaugle of title, leaving no land in him to be entered for taxes, and the state had no longer claims to taxes from him. We have concluded that this sale is valid.

One ground of irregularity is that in the column of the list of sales in which the estate (whether in fee or life) of the owner is to be stated there is a blank as to this tract, and so the estate is not given. Code 1868, chap. 31, § 25, it will be seen, makes sedulous efforts to cure numerous specific irregularities, so as to confer upon purchasers, effectually, such title as the party charged with taxes owned, and also inserts the general provision that the purchaser shall take such title “notwithstanding any irregularity in the proceedings under which the said grantee claims title, unless such irregularity appear on the face of the proceedings of record in the office of the recorder, and be such as materially to prejudice the rights of the owner.” First, I must say that there would be a presumption of a fee. A deed, under our statute, confers a fee, unless a less estate is stated; and even in a tax-sale list it would be a fair presumption. But who would be misled by it? And, so the owner be not misled, it is no matter as to others. How could he be misled? He would surely know his own estate without information from this list. How does this unsubstantial slip prejudice him? And the same section says, “And no irregularity as to the manner of laying off any real estate so sold, or in the plat, description, or report of the surveyor or other person, shall, after the deed is made, invalidate the sale or deed.” This is a strong curative provision. The sale list is a “report" under it, and the "estate" pertains to the "description." I know the books tell us that, in times past, tax sales were looked upon as forfeitures, and the proceedings must be rigidly regular; but these doctrines do not apply in full force in West Virginia, and ought not to, because our tax-sale system is, and long has been, so large and important to the state in collecting delinquent revenue, and to many buying at her sales, and so important, too, in quieting title and settling the waste places, that the legislature has, time and time again, in many acts, beginning as far back as 1814, sought to mitigate and qualify, if not abolish, the strict rule before prevailing, by which almost any irregularity would annul a tax sale, and provided that only substantial errors, capable of working harm to the former owner, and misleading him, and thus prevent timely redemption, should avoid such sale. Each one of these acts has gone further than its predecessor in this effort of liberalization. I referred to this legislation in Winning v. Eakin, 44 W. Va. 19, as did Judge Holt in Hays v. Heatherly, 36 W. Va. 613. Under this rigid procedure, tax sales were a myth, conferring on the purchaser a certain lawsuit, and as certain defeat; and the state had to buy in, herself, vast quantities of lands, which lay in her hands many years, wild and unsettled, paying no taxes, and she lost her revenue. Even to-day, with all this legislation, everybody regards tax titles as dangerous shadows. The state offers the land. The purchaser pays the taxes, and gets nothing. The innocent purchaser is disregarded, and the delinquent landowner is favored. True, it seems hard that he should lose his estate for a pittance, but whose fault is it? Is it the fault of the innocent purchaser? This state of things is not the fault of the legislature. It has seen the bigness of the evil, and often tried to remedy it. Anyone looking at its acts must see that it seeks to favor the innocent purchaser, to the extent of saving him from unsubstantial errors by ministerial officers, and technical defects not injuring the owner. The courts should be alert to execute a plain purpose of the lawmakers, and not to nullify it. And especially is it more difficult, after the sale has been executed by a deed, to annul the sale. The Code itself so intends, as above seen. Winning v. Eakin, 44 W. Va. 19. I am aware that in Jones v. Dils, 18 W. Va. 764, the opinion is expressed that the defect in question vitiates a sale; but the syllabus does not announce this as law. And in Barton v. Gilchrist, 19 W. Va. 230, the same opinion is expressed, though it may be called obiter, and is not in the syllabus.

Another irregularity is, as alleged, that the sale list does not show in whose name the land was charged for three out of four years for which it was sold. It shows as to one year confessedly, and a sale for that year's taxes would be as efficacious as four. It would call the owner to redeem. But, looking beyond the printed to the manuscript record, we find it plain that it was sold for four years.

Another defect alleged is that in the affidavit to the sale list the sheriff swears that the list contains a true account of all the real estate sold by "me during the present year for nonpayment of taxes due thereon for the years 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870 (or some of those years)." The words in parentheses are claimed to overthrow the whole sale proceeding of Randolph county. This affidavit is intended, perhaps, more to enforce a true account of the treasury than for the benefit of the landowner. By the unnecessary use of the words of surplusage, the sheriff meant to say some tracts were sold for some years, some for others, but the years named covered the years for which this land was sold. Now, it is the list that tells for what particular years the owner's land is sold, and Sponaugle had but to look at it; and that told him his land was sold for 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868. He should look at the list for this specification, rather than the affidavit, but read both together. The affidavit does not say or intimate that the land was sold for any other than those four years. The years it specified include all the years for which any tract was sold, and the list tells for what particular years a particular tract was sold.

Twenty-two years after the tax deed to Cresap, it is attacked. During all this long period Cresap and his alienees have paid taxes. This, as said above, would not help them, if their tax title were bad; but it is a satisfaction to a court, in rendering judgment, to feel sure that substantial justice is done. The present owners, on the faith of this title, spent a large sum in acquiring the land. The former owners failed to pay taxes charged, let the land be sold, failed to redeem, and afterwards failed to charge their land. They have always been in default, likely because the land was of little value; but now that this land is in reach of the West Virginia Central Railroad, which has pierced that mountain wilderness, and given it life and enterprise, and made land very valuable, and the lumber company is carrying on large operations in cutting timber on its land very near the line of this tract, the Sponaugle claimants come in to redeem. The suit is in the name of the state, it is true; but the contest is between them and the company, as the state has only a tax claim, and the Sponaugle representatives applied to redeem, and filed a cross bill to assail the tax title, and thus it is their suit. On which side is the equity, if we go by it? But the law decided it for the Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Company.

Therefore we reverse the decree, and dismiss the state's bill and the Cunningham cross bill.

Rehearing denied.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

John N. GLIDDEN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
MECHANICS' NATIONAL BANK of Pitts-

(53 Ohio St. 588.)

- *1. In the absence of express agreement authorizing it, a pledgee cannot become the purchaser of the pledged property at his own sale; and if the property be bid off by him the contract of pledge is not thereby terminated, nor the relations of the parties changed, unless the pledgee elects to treat the transaction as a valid sale, in which event the pledgee will be accountable for the net proceeds of the sale.
2. If the pledgeor do not so elect, the pledgee, while he retains the possession and control of the property with the ability to perform his part of the contract by restoring the property to the pledgeor, cannot be held for its conversion, without demand for its

The rule is general, if not universal, that the wrongful or unauthorized disposition of pledged property by the pledgee so as to put it out of his power to redeliver it on payment of the debt which it secures, is a conversion for which an action will lie.

return accompanied with an offer by the pledgeor to perform his part of the agreement.

3. When however, the pledgee puts it out of his power to perform his part of the agreement, by an unauthorized disposition of the property, he will be liable for its conversion without demand and offer of performance by the pledgeor; and when he has so disposed of a part of the property, he may be held for the conversion of all of it, as of the time of such disposition.

(December 17, 1895.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cuyahoga County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas allowing defendant's claim to the value of certain collateral security in a suit upon a promissory note. Affirmed.

Statement by Williams, J.:

The original action was brought by the Mechanics' National Bank against John N.

Hope v. Lawrence, 1 Hun. 317; Rosenzweig v. Frazer, 82 Ind. 342; Alnsworth v. Bowen, 9 Wis. 349, and it is asserted inferentially in nearly, if not all, the cases in this note.

And any disposition by a stock broker of the securities carried for a customer which would deprive him of his right to immediate possession thereof upon payment or tender of the indebtedness on account of such securities would amount to a conversion thereof. Douglas v. Carpenter, 17 App. Div. 329.

While a pledgee of personal property or security cannot transfer them to the injury of his pledgeor, or defeat the pledgeor of title to them until he has demanded payment and given the pledgeor opportunity to redeem, and then only at public sale and on notice, however, a transfer of his interest in the pledge is no fraud on the pledgeor, as he will occupy precisely the same position as before, and can redeem the pledge on the same terms. Drake v. Cloonan, 99 Mich. 121.

A pledgee of property to secure a debt acquires a special property therein which he may transfer to another without impairing the original lien, or give the pledgeor a right to reclaim it on any other or better terms than he could have done before the transfer. Belden v. Perkins, 78 Ill. 449; Whitney v. Peay, 24 Ark. 22; Williams v. Ashe, 111 Cal. 180; Bullard v. Billings, 2 Vt. 309; Tait v. Freedman's Sav. & T. Co. 93 U. S. 321, 23 L. ed. 886; Mores v. Conham, Owen, 123.

And a pawnee may assign his interest in the pledge, and the assignee will take it under all the responsibilities of the original pawnee, or he may transfer conditionally his interest by way of pawn to another, and his assignee may withhold the pledge until the debt of the original owner is discharged. National Bank v. Winston, 5 Baxt. 685.

So long as nothing is done by a pledgee to deprive the pledgeor of the right to redeem upon repayment of the amount due on the principal debt, the pledgeor is not injured, and the pledgee may assign the principal debt with the pledge to a third person who will hold it subject to payment and redemption the same as the pledgee, without being guilty of a conversion of the pledge. Chapman v. Brooks, 31 N. Y. 75.

The rule that a pledgeor is at liberty to treat an unauthorized sale of the pledged property as Glidden, in the court of common pleas of Cuyahoga county, on the following written obligation:

Pittsburg, Pa., August 30, 1883.

On October 10th after date I promise to pay to the order of the Mechanics' National Bank fourteen thousand, five hundred and twenty-four dollars, without defalcation, for value received, having pledged to the said bank as collateral security, in lieu of an indorser, nine warrants of the Union Storage Company numbers as follows: 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, for 108 (2268) tons each, 972 tons in all, with authority to sell the same on the nonperformance of this promise, in such manner as they in their discretion may think proper, without notice, either at public or private sale, and to apply the proceeds hereon holding me responsible for the deficiency, if any should occur.

(Signed) John N. Glidden.

The petition alleges that the iron referred to in the above obligation "remained in storage at the price agreed upon by said Glidden, with the Union Storage Company, under the said warrants described in said instrument until February 7, 1887, when the said plaintiff sold 15 tons of said iron at $20 a ton, $300; and on August 20, 1888, it sold 524 tons at $16 per ton, on paper running four months without interest, $8,398.97; and on September 11, 1888, it sold 108 tons at $16 per ton on time at four months without interest, $1,728; and on September 20, 1888, it sold 324 tons at $16 per ton on four months paper without interest, $5,184. All said iron was sold by said plaintiff in the exercise of the power given by said instrument of writing, and amounted to the sum of $15,610.97. The plaintiff further says that to reduce said time sales to cash required the payment of $306.21, leaving the balance that it received on the sale of said iron $15,304.76, less charges which the plaintiff alleges that it paid as follows:

Storage to the Union Storage Company under and by virtue of the terms of said warrants, which the defendant agreed to pay to a conversion by the pledgee applies only to such a sale as puts the property beyond the control of the pledgee. GLIDDEN v. MECHANICS' NAT. BANK.

So, in Mores v. Conham, Owen, 123, cited in Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass. 408, it was held that a pawnee has an interest and special property in a pawn which he may assign, but that if the assignee details it after payment by the owner he is liable to an action of detinue.

And in Bailey v. Colby, 34 N. H. 29, 66 Am. Dec. 752, in which the cause of action arose from a conditional sale, title to pass upon payment, it was held that while a sale of the property bailed by a pledgee or bailee puts an end to the bailment, his transfer of his interest only—that is, of the property subject to the rights of the general owner—will convey that interest, and the purchaser will hold the property in the same manner as the seller did.

A pawnee may deliver the goods pawned to a stranger without consideration, or he may sell or assign all his interest absolutely, or he may assign it conditionally by way of pawn, without in either case destroying the original lien or giving the owner a right to reclaim the property on any other or better terms than he could have done before such delivery or assignment. Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass. 389; Ratcliffe v. Davis, cited in Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass. 408.

And the severance of the security from the debt, and the assignment of a pledge without the debt secured by it, are not unlawful where the assignee takes but the nominal interest for the purpose of bringing an action, and the substantial interest remains in the pledgee. Easton v. Hodges, 18 Fed. Rep. 677.

Nor is a transfer of stock by a pledgee into other hands for the purpose of avoiding liability as a stockholder, taking the certificates back with a power of attorney to transfer them at his will, a transfer which will amount to a conversion of the stock pledged. Heath v. Griswold, 5 Fed. Rep. 573, 18 Blatchf. 555.

And transfers of mining stock, made by a pledgee thereof in good faith, for the purpose of relieving himself from supposed damage to his credit by reason of holding so much of that particular stock, does not amount in law to a conversion where there was no contract of sale, and no money or other consideration was paid 43 L. R. A.

or agreed to be paid, and he took back from the transferees blank assignments thereof, and all the stock remained within his control ready for delivery to the pledgee on payment of his indebtedness. Day v. Holmes, 103 Mass. 306.

So, where shares of stock are pledged to secure the payment of notes, and it is afterwards discovered that some of them had been fraudulently overissued by officers of the company, and the company under a decree of the court substituted genuine shares for spurious ones, which were delivered to the pledgee, the substitution is not such a change of the subject-matter of the pledge as will affect its identity, or the power of sale given in the pledge. Jeanes's Appeal, 116 Pa. 573.

And where stock in a mining corporation is pledged as collateral security for a loan, and the company afterwards reduces its capital under legislative authority and proportionately reduces the nominal value of the shares of its capital stock, the surrender by the pledgee of the original certificate of stock and the acceptance by him of a new certificate for the same number of shares, are not a wrongful conversion of the pledge where he took no part in the reorganization. Donnell v. Wyckoff, 49 N. J. L. 48.

So, where partners, after pledging goods to a creditor as collateral security for a debt, conveyed all their partnership property, including the goods pledged, to another in consideration of his agreement to obtain a discharge of their debts, appointing him their attorney to receive all debts, goods, and effects owing or belonging to the partnership, the delivery by the pledgee to such purchaser, upon payment of a portion of the debt, of a part of the property pledged, supposed to be proportionate with the payment, is not such a dealing with or disposition of his collateral security as will make him liable to account to the pledgeors for any greater sum than that received by him. Faulkner v. Hill, 104 Mass. 188.

And a pledgee of collateral securities may exchange them for other securities without the consent of the pledgeors where there is no restriction in the contract under which the pledge is given, and the fact that a note and other securities which had been delivered as collateral security for a loan had been exchanged for said Storage Company at the time that he placed said iron in their storage:

 From March 9, 1883, to Sept. 20,
 1888, 5yrs., 6 mos. and 10 dys. $3,223 80
 Freight on iron from Newcastle to Pittsburg, where said iron was sold, at 70c. a ton - - - 677 64 Commission paid to auctioneer for selling iron at 25c. per ton, - 243 00

Total charges - - - - $4,144 44
 —Which being taken from $15,304.76, leaves $11,160.32, which the plaintiff realized upon the sale of said iron, and no more.

The plaintiff further says that the freight paid by it on said iron from Newcastle to Pittsburg where the same was sold, was but the ordinary and reasonable freight over the line of railroad between said places; and the commission for selling the iron was the ordinary and customary price for the sale of the same.

The plaintiff says that after deducting said amounts so received by it on the sale of said iron, to wit, $11,160.32, as of the date of the last sale, to wit, September 20, 1888, other securities which had been found to be worthless is not a defense in an action on the note unless it appears that proper care and diligence had not been used, and that there had been a loss to the owners of the collaterals because thereof. Girard F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Marr, 46 Pa. 504.

And a payee of a note, who takes other notes as collateral security for the payment thereof, is not liable in trover for the conversion of the collaterals, where he transfers them with the principal note to an indorsee thereof, and the indorsee converts them to his own use. Goss v. Emerson, 28 N. H. 42.

But while a pledgee may, when not restrained by statute or agreement, sell and transfer his debt against the pledgeor, and transfer other collateral held by him to secure its payment to the assignee, he must act fairly, and in doing so must not prejudice the rights of the pledgeor or impair his right to redeem upon payment of the original debt. E. F. Hallack Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Gray, 19 Colo. 149.

And where one puts notes in the hands of another as collateral security for a specified purpose, and suit is brought thereon in the name of another, thus putting it beyond the power of the bailee to return the notes when the purposes for which they are pledged are satisfied, he is justly charged with their conversion. St. John v. O'Connel, 7 Port. (Ala.) 466.

A sale by a pledgee of bonds held as collateral security on the same day he receives them in pledge is clearly a tortious conversion of the securities. Butts v. Burnett, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 302.

b. With reference to corporate stock.

The rights of a pledgeor of stock are satisfied, and there is no conversion of his stock by the pledgee, where the stock in question was not defined and designated so as to be distinguished from other stock of the same corporation, and the pledgee had always in his possession and name, and under his control, shares to the amount of that pledged during the whole time of the credit given, and was ready, able, and willing at all times to account to the pledgeor for that number of shares and the dividends arising thereon whenever he entitled himself to such an account by payment. Nourse v. Prime, 43 L. R. A.

from the amount due on said note, there is due the plaintiff the sum of $7,708.73 thereon, with interest from said 20th day of September, 1888, no part of which has been paid.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays judgment against the said defendant in the said sum of $7,708.73, with interest thereon from the 20th day of September, 1888.

The answer, after admitting the execution of the written instrument sued on, and the corporate character of the plaintiff, and denying the other allegations of the petition, avers, by way of counterclaim, that "at the maturity of said note this defendant was so embarrassed that he could not and did not therefore pay the same; and that thereafter on or about the 5th day of November, 1883, the said plaintiff proceeded to advertise and sell at public auction the said iron at Pittsburg, though the iron itself was all still at Newcastle, about 50 miles away. And at said auction sale said plaintiff bid in all the iron named in said nine receipts, and all the iron covered thereby; and proceeded from that time forward to claim it and to manage

4 Johns. Ch. 490, 8 Am. Dec. 606, 7 Johns. Ch. 69, 11 Am. Dec. 403.

A pledgee of stock performs his duty, and is not liable as for a conversion, though he may have sold stock of the same kind as that pledged and cannot tell whether the stock so sold was the identical stock delivered to him as collateral security or not, where the shares of the stock in question do not appear to have been in any way distinguished or distinguishable from any other similar number of shares of the same stock. Berlin v. Eddy, 33 Mo. 426; Skiff v. Stoddard, 63 Conn. 198, 21 L. R. A. 102.

Where pledgees of stock procure a transfer of it to themselves on the books of the company, it becomes impossible to distinguish between those shares and others held by them, and it is of no consequence, therefore, that in selling stock they dispose of those particular shares, where at all times they have on hand an amount equal to or in excess of the shares received from the pledgee, and are constantly prepared to keep their contract with him. Hubbell v. Drexel, 11 Fed. Rep. 115.

And a sale by a pledgee of the same kind of stock is a sale of his own stock and not that of the pledgeor, where he was at all times able, ready, and willing to respond to the pledgeor in case he should come and demand his stock, whether the same identical shares were kept or not; and in such case it is not material whether the facts are imparted to the pledgeor or not. Hayward v. Rogers, 62 Cal. 372.

Thus, a pledgee of mining stock upon a redemption of the pledge is not obliged to return to the pledgeor the identical certificates pledged, but may return corresponding certificates, and the fact that the pledgee sells the particular certificates pledged does not render him liable as for a conversion, where he retains and restores similar certificates, and remains at all times ready to do so. Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99.

And a broker who agrees to hold stock of a customer as security for money advanced is not liable to the customer for the money which the latter had invested in such stock, because his share had not been kept separate from the mass of the broker's stock, where one share was precisely equal in value to every other share, and and control it as its own, and did then and there convert it to its own use; and has ever since until the time of filing said amended petition, controlled and claimed as its own, said iron, by virtue of said public sale of November 5, 1883.

"And this defendant says that at the time when said plaintiff so converted said iron to its own use, the same was of the value of $17 per ton, and of the total value of $18,360 for which sum plaintiff then and there became and was liable to account to this defendant. And that when sufficient is applied therefrom to pay the amount then due on said note, there remains the sum of $3,780.33 for which said plaintiff is indebted to this defendant with interest from November 5, 1883; for which amount this defendant asks judgment against said plaintiff."

The reply controverts, generally, the allegations of the counterclaim, but "admits and avers that just prior to November 5, 1883, the plaintiff advertised said iron for sale at public auction in newspapers of general circulation in the vicinity where said iron was located, that said sale would occur on the 5th day of November, 1883. The plaintiff further admits that on said day it offered for sale at public auction, the iron covered by said receipts or warrants, and there being no one present that was willing to give as much therefor as one W. H. Carr, who was president of the plaintiff, he, the said Carr, bid for portions of said iron about $10 per ton, and for some other portions about $11 per ton, he being the highest bidder for the same at said sale; and the said Carr purchased the same for said plaintiff in the belief that he had the right to do so; but the plaintiff says that the said defendant Glidhe always had the requisite quantity of shares on hand to meet the customer's demand. Horton v. Morgan, 19 N. Y. 170, 75 Am. Dec. 311.

It is not necessary that stock purchased by a broker for a customer upon a margin, and held by him as security for advances, should be kept separate and apart from other stock of the same company belonging to him, or that it should be so marked as to designate it as belonging to the customer, if he keeps and has in his possession either that or a like quantity of similar stock ready for delivery upon the customer paying what he owed upon it; that is all that is required. Worthington v. Tormey, 34 Md. 182.

And brokers in ordinary transactions between them and their principals perform their duty so long as they are prepared at all times to deliver on payment and demand certificates representing the requisite number of shares of the kind of stock purchased, though they may have disposed of the identical shares of stocks purchased on some one particular order. Boylan v. Huguet, 8 Nev. 345; Gilpin v. Howell, 5 Pa. 41, 45 Am. Dec. 720; Caswell v. Putnam, 120 N. Y. 153; Douglas v. Carpenter, 17 App. Div. 329.

There is nothing in the relation of a customer and his broker who purchases stock for him on a margin for speculation which requires that certificates should be taken out identifying the stock, and retained by the broker subject to the customer's order upon his paying the balance; the brokers are only bound to have enough of the stock on hand to make an immediate transfer on demand, and in case of such a transaction the customer cannot repudiate the acts of the broker because no such certificates had been taken out, and recover the amount paid the broker. Horton v. Morgan, 6 Duer, 56.

And a pledgee of bank shares as security for the payment of his note under an agreement for the sale thereof in case of failure to pay, which note was not paid and the shares were sold at a reduced figure, cannot call on the pledgee to account for the sale of the like amount of shares at the highest price obtained during the year of the transaction, on the ground that the pledgor's stock had never been sold, where the shares in question were not defined and designated, so as to be distinguished from other bank shares in the same bank. Nourse v. Prime, 4 Johns. Ch. 490, 8 Am. Dec. 606, 7 Johns. Ch. 89, 11 Am. Dec. 403.

And a customer for whom a firm of brokers purchased stock and pledged or otherwise disposed of it, after which they became insolvent, may reach similar stock coming into the hands of the receiver unencumbered by any pledge, and have a delivery of it by paying to the receiver the amount due to the firm with respect to it. Chamberlain v. Greenleaf, 4 Abb. N. C. 178.

So, it has been held that the sale of stocks pledged by a pledgee as a conversion presents a case for nominal damages only, where the pledgee was at all times ready and willing to transfer to the owner an equivalent number of similar shares in the same company by a proper and valid certificate. Atkins v. Gamble, 42 Cal. 86, 10 Am. Rep. 282. And see Ogden v. Lathrop, 65 N. Y. 158, infra, III. d.

A broker purchasing stock for a customer is bound to keep at all times on hand or under his control, either the particular shares purchased, or an equal amount of other shares of the same kind, however, and to have them in such a situation that the customer paying the amount due by him can at any time obtain them; and this is so whether the broker holds the stock as pledgee or under a special contract. Tausig v. Hart, 58 N. Y. 425.

A pledge is not for use but merely as a security; and if the pledgee sells it without authority it is a violation of his trust, although he afterwards purchases other articles of the same kind and value, to be returned to the pledgee, unless there is some agreement, either express or implied, between the parties that he shall be permitted to do so. Dykers v. Allen, 7 Hill, 497, 42 Am. Dec. 87, 3 Hill, 597.

In Allen v. Dykers, 3 Hill, 597, Nourse v. Prime, 4 Johns. Ch. 490, 8 Am. Dec. 606, 7 Johns. Ch. 89, 11 Am. Dec. 403, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the pledgees had at all times after the date of the note a sufficient amount of stock standing in their own names subject to their absolute control to have enabled them to restore the shares of stock deposited with them.

And a tender of other similar bonds by a pledgee with whom had been pledged bonds as collateral security upon a demand therefor is not good, and will not enable him to recover in an action for the recovery of the money loaned, in the absence of proof that such bonds had been continuously in his possession from the time of the loan. Stuart v. Bigler, 98 Pa. 80.

And evidence of a demand by a pledgee of bonds for their return, and tender of the amount due thereon, and of a refusal by the pledgee and a tender of a like number of similar bonds, is sufficient to go to the jury on the question of the conversion of the bonds, in an action by the pledgee to recover the principal debt. Ibid.

A broker who purchased stock for a customer den repudiated said sale, because of the fact that said plaintiff could not be both seller and buyer, and refused to recognize the validity of the sale, and has ever since and now does repudiate said sale and refuse to recognize its validity. The plaintiff especially denies that it controverted said iron to its own use, but alleges that the said iron was kept and retained in said storage where placed by said Glidden until the time stated in said petition, when the same was sold for the price and in the manner therein stated."

Upon the trial of the issues to a jury, the court charged that the purchase of the iron by Carr for the bank constituted a conversion of the iron as of the date of November 5, 1883; and that the defendant could hold the "bank to an account for that iron for what it was reasonably worth on November 5, 1883, in the market where the iron was sold."

A verdict was returned finding the issues for the defendant, and assessing the balance due him, after deducting the debt due the bank from the value of the iron on the 5th day of November, 1883; and, after the overruling of a motion for a new trial filed by the plaintiff, judgment was rendered on the verdict. A bill of exceptions, containing all the evidence, was duly allowed and filed, and on error prosecuted to the circuit court, the judgment was reversed, upon the ground, as stated in the journal entry, "that said court of common pleas erred in holding that the sale by the plaintiff in error of November 5, 1883, of the iron held by it, as collateral security, was a conversion at that time," and the cause was remanded for a new trial. Er-and carried the same as security for advances, who sells all he has of that kind of stock, will be deemed to have sold the customer's stock, and the customer can ratify the sale and claim the benefit thereof, or claim the value of the shares on the date of the sale; and the subsequent acquisition by the broker after the stock had fallen to a lower figure of a sufficient number of shares to replace those which he had held for the customer will not relieve him from liability. Taussig v. Hart, 58 N. Y. 425.

And the fact that a broker who had failed did not have enough stock of a particular kind to fill all his contracts therefor cannot be urged as an objection to a recovery as for a conversion of stocks by a customer for whom he had purchased stocks of that kind, and who had not assented to the assignment, and had made a demand for a return of his stocks, which was refused. Boylan v. Huguet, 8 Nev. 345.

And where a firm of stock brokers becomes insolvent having a block of stocks in its hands carried for customers on margins, which is insufficient to meet all the demands of such customers as pledgees of the stock, it is to be divided pro rata among them, and a shortage of the stock pledged is to be borne pro rata. Skiff v. Stoddard, 68 Conn. 198, 21 L. R. A. 102.

So, a pledgee with whom stock has been deposited as collateral security for an indebtedness payable on demand, which he sells before demanding payment, is not relieved from liability for the conversion by a tender and return of an equal number of shares of converted stock in the same company, where the stock pledged was consolidated stock, and there was a material difference in the market price between the consolidated and the converted stock. Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443, 51 Am. Dec. 307.

The rule has been laid down in some cases, however, that a pledgee of stock is entitled upon payment of the indebtedness to have the identical shares returned, where they can be identified and separated from the other stock; and in such case if they are not returned the pledgee would be liable for their value. Allen v. Dubois (Mich.) 5 Det. L. N. 158, 75 N. W. 443.

So, a pledgee of stock has been held to be bound to keep the stock ready for delivery to the pledgee on payment of the debt at maturity or at any time afterwards before a sale in accordance with the terms of the pledge, and has no right in the meantime to sell or loan or pledge it; and if he transfer it to a creditor of his own, the pledgee may treat his act as a conversion; and the fact that he has a large number of shares of stock in the same corporation standing to his credit on the books is immaterial. Fay v. Gray, 124 Mass. 500.

In the above case Day v. Holmes, 103 Mass. 806, supra, I. a. was distinguished upon the ground that there the pledgee assigned the collateral stock to third persons in order not to injure his credit by appearing to own too much of it, but kept it in his own control by taking assignments in blank from the transferee by means of which he could redeliver the stock if the pledgee should become entitled to it, while in the present case the transfer was for the purpose of returning stock, which the pledgee owed the transferee, which would put the stock beyond his control.

So, one on whose behalf a firm of stockbrokers borrowed a sum of money for a designated term from another firm of stock brokers upon the security of certain railway stock, which was transferred by the borrower to the lender, and the lender pending the loan sold the stock, transferring a similar amount to the borrower on his repaying the loan, has been held to be entitled to sue the lender as principal in the transaction, and the lender is bound to return the identical stock pledged, and is therefore liable to the borrower for the disposition thereof for the amount of profits realized by his dealings in it. Langton v. Walte, L. R. 6 Eq. 165, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 345, 18 L. T. N. S. 80, 16 Week. Rep. 508.

And where stock brokers employed to purchase a specified amount of United States bonds made a purchase and reported it to the customer at a price greater than that paid, and upon the customer's failure to pay therefor upon maturity of the demand similar bonds were sold leaving a deficiency, and an action was brought by the customer to repudiate the alleged purchase and recover back the money paid, a counterclaim for the deficiency arising on such sale was held to have been properly rejected, as substantial performance of their contract by the brokers was a condition precedent to their right to recover. Levy v. Loeb, 85 N. Y. 365.

The burden of proof in an action by a lender against a borrower for money loaned, where the borrower had deposited bonds as collateral security, and upon demand the lender had declared himself unable to restore the bonds, but tendered a like number of similar ones, rests with the lender to rebut the prima facie presumption that he had converted the bonds pledged, either by producing them or satisfactorily accounting for their nonproduction, and he cannot recover in case of failure to do so. Stuart v. Bigler, 98 Pa. 80.

The above rule has been applied to personal property where one item or parcel is the exact ror is prosecuted here to obtain the reversal of the judgment of the circuit court, and the affirmance of that of the common pleas.

A further statement of facts is contained in the opinion.

Messrs. Burke & Ingersells, for plaintiff in error:

Any distinct act of dominion wrongfully exerted by one on the property of another is a conversion.

equivalent of another, it having been held that a purchaser from a pledgee of a quantity of barrels of oil cannot take advantage of the wrong of the pledgee in disposing of the oil, where he afterwards substitutes in its place and delivers to the purchaser other barrels of oil of like quantity and value which are accepted by him: and it is no defense in an action by a pledgee to recover the amount of his lien upon the goods. Carrington v. Ward, 71 N. Y. 360.

But in Levy v. Loeb, 15 Jones & S. 61, affirmed 75 N. Y. 609, the court below made a finding of law that, in the absence of an express agreement that a pledgee might part with bonds pledged, or use them, provided a sufficient amount of like bonds were always kept on hand, he was bound to keep in his possession the identical bonds bought for a customer, on the ground that government bonds have not the same equivalency between them that measures of grain or undivided interests in capital stock of corporations evidenced by certificates have between themselves; but the court on appeal refused to express an opinion thereon, deciding the case upon other grounds.

II. Power to sell.

a. General statement as to.

So, though a sale is absolute, passing title and depriving the pledgee of power to return the thing pledged in case of tender of payment by the pledgee, it is not necessarily wrongful or unlawful, the question whether or not it is so depending upon whether or not the pledgee was authorized to sell, the extent of the power to sell if any there was, and its construction and the manner in which it was exercised.

b. Implied authority.

1. The general rule.

In the absence of contract regulating the matter, a pledgee may, in default of payment of the debt secured upon giving reasonable notice, sell the pledged property at public auction and appropriate the proceeds to the payment of the debt, unless the character of the thing pledged be such that the law will presume that it was the intention of the parties that the money should be raised in some other way than by a sale, as in the case of a bill of exchange or promissory note which matures in a short time. Kling v. Texas Bkg. & Ins. Co. 58 Tex. 669.

2. As to goods and chattels.

A high degree of good faith is required on the part of a bailee of property.

Bates v. Wiles, 1 Handy (Ohio) 532; Everett v. Coffin, 6 Wend. 603, 22 Am. Dec. 551; Boyes v. Brockway, 31 N. Y. 490; Scott v. Rogers, 31 N. Y. 676; Strong v. National Mechanics' Bkg. Asso. 45 N. Y. 718; Pease v. Smith, 61 N. Y. 477.

Every unauthorized taking of personal property, and all intermeddling with it beyond the extent of authority conferred in case a limited authority had been given with an intent to interfere with the owner's dominion, is a conversion.

Laverty v. Snethen, 68 N. Y. 522, 23 Am. Rep. 184; McCormick v. Pennsylvania C. R. Co. 99 N. Y. 67, 52 Am. Rep. 6; Serfat v. Utica, I. & E. R. Co. 102 N. Y. 681; Comley v. Dazian, 114 N. Y. 161.

goods and chattels pawned or pledged may be sold either with or without judicial process, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debt. Union Trust Co. v. Rigdon, 93 Ill. 458.

Where goods are deposited by way of security to indemnify a party against a loan of money, the contract between the parties is to repay the money on the one part, and to redeliver the goods upon the other, and if the one party fails to repay the other may sell the security for the purpose of repaying himself. Pothonier v. Dawson, Holt, N. P. 383.

Thus, where goods are deposited as security for the repayment of a loan of money on a future day certain power to sell in default of payment on that day is implied by law from the nature of the transaction, though there was no express stipulation to that effect, and in case of such sale under such circumstances, an action for conversion thereof cannot be maintained. Pigot v. Cubley, 15 C. B. N. S. 701, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 134, 10 Jur. N. S. 318, 9 L. T. N. S. 804, 12 Week. Rep. 467.

But a pledgee of chattels pledged without authority by one to whom they had been intrusted by the owner for a special purpose is liable to a subsequent purchaser thereof in trover after notice of the true ownership and demand by the owner, which he refused, after a demand by such purchaser, though he sold the property after the first and before the second demand. Carpenter v. Hale, 8 Gray, 157.

So, while the pawnee of a slave may assign his claim he cannot, either at civil or common law, make an absolute sale of the slave without observance of the prescribed conditions and formalities in cases of nonpayment. Jones v. Thurmond, 5 Tex. 318.

And in the absence of any express contract or any custom or usage in relation thereto, a broker employed to purchase pork and lard on the board of trade upon a margin has no right to sell or close out the contracts made for the customer before their maturity unless the customer so directs, or unless he fails to keep his margins good, and in case he does so the customer can recover back of the broker the money deposited as margins, and the loss, if any, occasioned by the closing out of such contracts. Denton v. Jackson, 106 Ill. 433.

But a transaction by which a customer deposited with a broker a sum of money as a margin to secure him against loss by any decline in the market, and the broker purchased at his request and for his account a designated amount of gold coin to pay for which the customer advanced an amount in currency, implies that if the customer should fail to keep the broker secured against loss by maintaining the margin the broker would have the right to sell the gold for reimbursement and security. Schepeler v. Eisner, 3 Daly, 11, Affirmed. 54 N. Y. 675.

So, the receipt by a creditor of goods of another from his debtor in pledge, supposing them to belong to the debtor, and afterwards permitting the debtor to sell the goods on the promise of the purchaser to pay the creditor the price thereof toward the discharge of the debts for which they were pledged, does not constitute a conversion thereof, and does not render him liable to the true owner in an action of trover. Leonard v. Tidd, 3 Met. 6.

And evidence that one person asked another for a loan, and offered his watch as security, which the other took and went away and upon returning in about twenty minutes said that he could not let him have all the money, but that he had not got the watch, declining to give any explanation, does not show any tortious act upon the part of the proposed lender for which an action for conversion will lie. Hall v. Robinson, 2 N. Y. 293.

So, where goods are sent to a factor for sale, and he makes an advance upon them and is afterwards ordered not to sell, he ceases to be a factor and becomes a pledgee as to the advance, having the right of a pledgee to sell on giving reasonable notice, but if he sells without such notice he is liable for the damages suffered by the consignor therefrom. Marfield v. Goodhue, 3 N. Y. 62.

And a power of sale in case of nonpayment of the principal debt is not implied in a contract of pledge where there is no stipulated day for payment, or where the stipulated time has been rendered indefinite by subsequent agreement, and in such case a sale without proper demand and notice would be a conversion. Pigot v. Cubley, 15 C. B. N. S. 701, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 134, 10 Jur. N. S. 318, 9 L. T. N. S. 804, 12 Week. Rep. 467.

If one delivers stock or cattle to another to be kept and fed, with power to sell them to pay for their keeping, the pledgee has the right to sell only so much of the stock as is necessary to pay what may be due him for the keeping and feeding, and if he proceeds to sell all of them, which was not necessary to pay the expense of such keeping, it is a conversion of the portion of the stock sold by him which was not necessary to pay the debt due for keeping, for which trover will lie. Whitlock v. Heard, 18 Ala. 776, 48 Am. Dec. 73.

may be lawfully sold at public auction after the debt is due upon demand of payment and due notice of the time and place of sale, unless the sale thereof is restricted by express stipulation. Brown v. Ward, 3 Duer, 660.

And bonds are negotiable instruments which pass by delivery, and may be sold on default of a pledgeor even though there was no express stipulation in the contract of pledge for a sale, and they may be sold upon default in payment after an adjudication in bankruptcy against the pledgeor. Jerome v. McCarter, 94 U. S. 734, 24 L. ed. 136. Bank of Old Dominion v. Dubuque & P. R. Co. 8 Iowa, 277, 74 Am. Dec. 302; Middlesex Bank v. Minot, 4 Met. 325.

And county bonds held as collateral security for an indebtedness may be sold by the pledgee on default, as the mode of making county bonds available is by sale thereof. Alexandria L. & H. R. Co. v. Burke, 22 Gratt. 254.

A deposit of coupon bonds of an incorporate company transferable by delivery as collateral security for the payment of promissory notes soon to mature differs entirely from a deposit of ordinary bonds, mortgages, promissory notes, and like choses in action, which in the absence of agreement the creditor cannot expose to sale because they have no market value, the fair presumption being that they were designed to be held as a pledge and exposed to be sold after demand and due notice, like goods, chattels, stock, and public securities, in case of nonpayment of the debt. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Lewis, 12 N. J. Eq. 323.

A sale by a pledgee of shares of stock to be held as collateral for the payment of notes, drafts, etc., discounted or held by a bank against the pledgeor made in default of a demand for payment of a debt which included a large sum for which the stock was not pledged, however, and because the debtor declined to pay another debt to another person which was not included in the pledge, is an unlawful conversion of the stock for which the pledgeor is entitled to recover. Blood v. Erie Dime Sav. & L. Co. 164 Pa. 95.

And where a broker holds shares of bank stock for a customer as collateral security to a debt due on account of gold purchased for him, and the customer gives an absolute order to sell at a designated price, at which price they then might have sold, and the broker fails to sell at that time and afterwards sells at a lower price, and the customer tenders a sufficient sum to pay the balance of the amount if the sale had been made at the higher price, a sale after such tender is a conversion entitling the customer to recover the value of the stock sold after deduct-

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record discloses that at the time of the execution of the written instrument on which the action below was founded, the maker, Glidden, had in store with the Union Storage Company, at Newcastle, Pennsylvaing the actual indebtedness for which the property was pledged. Hope v. Lawrence, 1 Hun, 817.

And an owner of stock who loans it to another to enable him to pledge it as security for the purchase of particular stock, such stock having been issued to a trustee who had indorsed it in blank, which was used for that purpose by pledging it to a broker who purchased the required stock and afterwards sold it at an advance, and the broker thereupon refused to return the pledged stock but held it for another indebtedness against the pledgor, and sold it after notice by the real owner of his claim and after offer by him to pay any proper charges against it, is entitled to judgment against the pledgee for such sale as a conversion of his stock. Niles v. Edwards, 90 Cal. 10.

And a corporation which takes shares of stock as collateral security for the payment of a note, and permits the stock to be transferred absolutely and for a good consideration to its president to be held by him in his own right, violates its duty as a pledgee, and such transfer constitutes a misappropriation or conversion of the pledge rendering it liable for its value; and such liability may be asserted by way of recoupment or counterclaim in an action on the note. Star. F. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 9 Jones & S. 287.

And a custom or usage by which brokers may use by hypothecation or otherwise securities received by them as a margin in transactions of a particular kind is not admissible in evidence in an action by a customer against a broker with whom he had pledged certain stock certificates as security against losses in a contemplated transaction for their conversion, by a sale thereof, though the customer knew of such custom or usage. Lawrence v. Maxwell, 58 N. Y. 19.

So, one who holds state scrip as a pledge or collateral security for a note with authority to sell for nonpayment has the right to sell in such case so much of the scrip as is necessary to pay the indebtedness and no more, and where more is sold the pledgee is responsible for the damage done. Fitzgerald v. Blocher, 32 Ark. 742, 29 Am. Rep. 3.

Where a deposit as security for an indebtedness is separable, no greater amount in value thereof should be sold in case of nonpayment than is sufficient to pay the debt. Ibid.

But a pledgee of scrip who sells more than is necessary to pay the debt due is not liable to the pledgor who accepts the proceeds and replaces the scrip for anything more than the difference between the price received for the scrip and the price paid to replace it. Ibid. 43 L. R. A.

In the above case Hamilton v. State Bank, 22 Iowa, 306, infra, IV., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the sale was made by the direction and express consent of the plaintiff given on the day of the sale.

4. As to choses in action.

The general rule, subject to some exceptions noted below, is that where notes or other choses in action are deposited as collateral security, and the contract is entirely silent as to the power of the pledgee over them, he has no right on default in payment of the original indebtedness to sell the notes either at private or public sale or at auction, but is bound to hold and collect them as they come due, and apply the money to the payment of the loan and return the balance if any to the pledgor. Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 892, 5 Duer, 29; Brown v. Ward, 3 Duer, 660; E. F. Hallack Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Gray, 19 Colo. 149; Cole v. Dalziel, 13 Ill. App. 23; Joliet Iron & S. Co. v. Scioto Fire Brick Co. 82 Ill. 548, 25 Am. Rep. 341; Union Trust Co. v. Rigdon, 93 Ill. 458; Zimbleman v. Veeder, 98 Ill. 613; Stevens v. Wiley, 165 Mass. 402; McLemore v. Hawkins, 46 Miss. 715; Whittaker v. Charleston Gas Co. 16 W. Va. 717.

And in the absence of such an agreement a court of equity will not decree a sale. Whittaker v. Charleston Gas Co. 16 W. Va. 717.

While the holder of stocks and bonds of a corporation as collateral security may sell them at public auction after demand of payment and due notice of sale a pledge of commercial paper as security for a loan of money does not, in the absence of a special power for that purpose, authorize the pledgee upon the nonpayment of the debt and upon notice to the pledgor, to sell the securities either at public or at private sale; he is bound to hold and collect the same when due, and apply the money to the payment of the loan, for the reason that notes, not being usually marketable at their fair value, must generally be sold at a sacrifice, so that injustice would be likely to be done to the debtor. Fletcher v. Dickinson, 7 Allen, 23.

And the holder of a promissory note indorsed to him as collateral security for advances made, who sells the note to another, is liable to the indorser for its value at the time of the sale, which is prima facie the amount of the note when transferred including interest. Hazard v. Duke, 64 Ind. 220.

And where two notes secured by a mortgage on real estate were transferred as collateral security to certain other notes which the pledgee then held against the pledgor under an agree-nia, 972 tons of pig iron, for which he held the company's nine storage warrants mentioned in the instrument. Each warrant bound the company to deliver the iron represented by it to the order of Glidden at the place of storage, upon payment of the charges and surrender of the warrant properly indorsed. When the instrument sued on was executed by Glidden, he duly transferred the nine warrants to the bank for the purpose of pledging the iron as collateral security for the debt so contracted. On the 5th day of November, 1883, the debt having then become due, and being unpaid, the bank offered the iron for sale at public auction, after having published notice to that effect in some of the newspapers of Pittsburg; and the president of the bank, in its behalf, made a bid of $10 per ton for part of the iron, and $11 per ton for the remainder, and all of it was struck off to him at those prices. Thereupon, the cashier of the bank notified the storage company of the purchase, and requested the ownership of the iron to be transferred at once to the president of the bank. That company made the transfer on its books, and thereafter, from time to time, rendered its accounts for storage, against the bank, which were paid by it. No demand of the debt was made of Glidden before the sale, nor was any notice of the sale given him, before or after it occurred; the first information he had with respect to it was when the action below was commenced, in 1888. In the meantime, however, he had made no effort to pay his debt, and no inquiry concerning it, or the situation of the iron pledged for its security, for the reason, as he states, that he had become embarrassed, and unable to pay the debt. At the time of meant that when such other notes were paid the notes and mortgages were to be reassigned or the proceeds received accounted for, the pledgee had no right, by private agreement between himself and another of which the pledgeor had no notice, to sell the securities for a sum much less than the amount due upon them to one who purchased them for the purpose of discharging the mortgage, to the knowledge of the pledgee. Fletcher v. Dickinson, 7 Allen, 23.

So, in Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 125, which was an action for the conversion by a pledgee of a chose in action by a sale thereof without notice, it was said that it may well be doubted whether the pledgee was authorized to sell a pledge of this character at all, and whether he was not bound to collect the amount due on the chose in action and reimburse himself out of the proceeds.

When a creditor who has received a note as collateral security transfers it to another he must be taken to have elected that mode of payment, and to have made the security a substitute for the debt. Cocke v. Chaney, 14 Ala. 66.

And where one debt is transferred as collateral security for another the creditor becomes an agent for the collection, and the amount collected after deducting costs and other charges should be credited on the debt to be secured, and if the transferee transfers the security, he appropriates it to his own use and to the extent of its value the debt is thereby extinguished. Ibid.

And where a collateral note is transferred without a transfer of the original indebtedness, the transfer operates as a payment to the extent of the amount then due upon it of the original indebtedness, leaving only the residue, and where this is done one taking the note representing the original indebtedness after maturity can only recover the balance due after allowing credit for the collateral note. Ware v. Russell, 57 Ala. 43, 29 Am. Rep. 710.

When commercial securities pledged as collateral for the payment of a debt are sold by the pledgee without authority before maturity of the debt, the pledgeor may at his election either ratify the sale and claim the proceeds or treat the unauthorized sale as a conversion, and recover the advance in the market price from the time of the sale up to a reasonable time within which to replace the securities, or hold the pledgee for a breach of his duty to keep the property pledged until the maturity of the debt and claim as damages the market value of the securities at that time. Dimock v. United States Nat. Bank, 55 N. J. L. 296.

And where one comes into the possession of notes lawfully as a pledge and security for another note, and he sells or trades them for bank stock to another, the conversion takes place at the time of the absolute trade and wrongful disposition and notice thereof to the pledgeor. Walley v. Deseret Nat. Bank, 14 Utah, 305.

Where notes deposited as collateral are converted, however, it is competent for the defendant in an action therefor to show in reduction of damages the inability of the maker to pay, his insolvency, or any other matter which would legitimately affect or diminish the value of the notes at the time of the conversion, though they had no market value. Ibid.

And the sale by a pledgee of notes of a third person held as collateral security for the payment of the pledgeor's note at public auction after default is not a conversion thereof where it was made under an authority to collect or negotiate for the purpose of liquidating the principal debt in case of nonpayment. Fraker v. Reeve, 36 Wis. 85.

In the above case Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the contract was entirely silent as to the power of the pledgee over the subject of the pledge.

And where a borrower gives his own note for a sum larger than that borrowed, secured by deed of trust as collateral security for the note given for the original indebtedness, both notes being made by him and payable to the same payee, the first note will be deemed to have been without consideration and the payee will only have power to sell and transfer the original note and trust deed to raise money with which to pay the smaller one and until sold and indorsed the larger note is inoperative, and no sale can be made under the trust deed securing them. Walker v. Carleton, 97 Ill. 587.

Upon the other hand, however, it has been held that the rule that a pledge may be sold after maturity of the principal debt upon due notice is the same where the pledge is a promissory note of a third person as when it is a chattel, when the note will not mature until a long time after the time fixed for the maturity of the loan. Richards v. Davis, 5 Clark (Pa.) 471.

And that the authority of a pledgee of a note to give the pledgeor notice and to sell the pledge is not affected by the fact that the pledge is a negotiable note of a third person not yet due. Brightman v. Reeves, 21 Tex. 70.

And that where negotiable notes are delivered as collateral security it is upon the supposition that something is due or at least owing upon them, and they may be collected or sold to raise the auction sale, the iron was worth in the market from $16 to $17 per ton, and the defendant sought, by way of counterclaim, to compel the bank to account for the market value of the iron, as of that date, upon the ground that the sale constituted a conversion of it. An account upon that basis leaves a balance due Glidden. After that sale the iron remained in store, as it had been before, at the same place, subject to the same charges, and without change in any respect, except the transfer of ownership on the books of the storage company to the president of the bank, and the entry of the storage charges against it, until February 7, 1887, when the bank sold 15 tons of the iron at $20 per ton, and thereafter, in August and September, 1888, sold the balance for $16 per ton; and an account stated upon the basis of those sales, after deducting storage charges, leaves a balance due the bank. In making these sales, the officers of the bank believing in good faith it had become the owner of the iron at the auction sale, assumed to sell it as the property of the bank, and not under or in execution of the power of sale contained in the instrument by which it was pledged; but it claims the sales were within the power thus given. The case here turns upon the question whether the first sale constituted a conversion? The right of the pledgee to sell the article pledged upon the nonperformance of the pledgor's obligation is the one characteristic which distinguishes a pledge from a common-law lien; and while the former is always accompanied with an implied power of sale, if none be expressed, it is often declared in the contract of pledge, and the exercise of the power may, of course, be regulated and controlled, and the rights the money due for which they are pledged, or may, if nothing be due, and they are only in the nature of accommodation papers, be negotiated, and the money applied on the debt for which they were intended as a security. Walker v. Carleton, 97 Ill. 587.

So, in England the rule of law that if the pawnor neglects or refuses to comply with his engagement, the pawnee may upon due demand or notice to the pawnor require the pawn to be sold, applies to a pledge of choses in action, as well as to a pledge of physical chattels. France v. Clark, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 830, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 263, 48 L. T. N. S. 185, 31 Week. Rep. 374.

And a pledgee who takes, as collateral security for the return of certain railroad bonds loaned, two notes and an acceptance made by the borrower and indorsed by third persons as accommodation indorsers, who demands the bonds of the agent of the borrower on the date on which they were made returnable by the agreement, tendering the securities in exchange for them, may lawfully sell such securities at public auction after due notice for his reimbursement, where they had all fallen due before the notice of sale was given. Potter v. Thompson, 10 R. I. 1.

And a wholesale merchant who makes an arrangement with a jobber to give him accommodation in the form of loans, discounts, and the sale of goods, for which the jobber places bonds, notes, and accounts of his customers in the hands of the merchant as collateral security without agreement as to the mode in which they are to be dealt with, and the jobber afterwards fails, largely indebted to the merchant, may compound or compromise a debt held by him as such collateral if, looking to the interests of the creditor in the exercise of an honest discretion, that is deemed best. Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187.

So, in Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Fisher, 9 N. J. Eq. 687, 64 Am. Dec. 423, it was doubted, though nothing was decided, whether a third party's bond or mortgage deposited by way of collateral security or as a pledge can be sold by the pledgee in default of payment after notice to the pledgor, unless a known usage or express agreement to do so is shown.

But in Commercial Bank v. Shuart, 46 Barb. 371, which was an action brought by creditors holding notes to reach a note made by third persons and deposited to secure an accommodation indorser on the principal note against loss, it was held that it was entirely competent for the accommodation indorser to convert the collateral note into money by selling and transferring it to a third person, and that after he had so sold it and received the money therefor neither the purchaser, nor any person to whom the purchaser might have transferred it, was responsible for the manner in which he appropriated the proceeds.

The rule applicable to commercial paper, that the pledgee thereof cannot sell the same on default of payment of the original debt without a special authority, is applicable to railroad bonds payable upon condition. Joliet Iron & S. Co. v. Scioto Fire Brick Co. 82 Ill. 548, 25 Am. Rep. 341.

And a holder of a mortgage as collateral security, who causes the property to be sold on execution, himself becoming the purchaser, does not, within the California Code, § 3006, hold the title as a trustee for his debtor, unless it is shown that he obtained the title by some fraudulent means; he cannot sell an evidence of debt of that kind, but may collect the same when due, and to that end he may foreclose the lien and himself become the purchaser, and he takes an absolute title to the property and must account for the proceeds. Kelly v. Matlock, 85 Cal. 122.

c. Special authority.

1. Express contracts, generally.

A sale of a pledge under a special power made to a third person cannot be treated as an unlawful conversion for which trover will lie. Cole v. Dalsiel, 13 Ill. App. 23.

Thus, sales of collaterals made to third persons which are not impeached for fraud or unfairness, under an authority to sell the pledges for payment of the debt without notice, are valid and not the subject of an action of trover. Baltimore Marine Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 269.

And under a contract by which one pledges a note to another with express authority to sell the note on default at either public or private sale without notice, the title of the pledgee is gone beyond reach where a bona fide sale is made to a person capable of buying. Zimelman v. Veeder, 98 Ill. 613.

And a direction by the drawer of drafts to one who held his securities to pay them from the proceeds of the securities gives authority to sell such securities, and an order to pay in funds from the proceeds makes the deduction conclusive that other sales are yet to be made. and a sale under such authority without notice of the time or place and without previous demand of payment is good, and does not constitute a conversion of the securities. Hyatt v. Argenti, 3 Cal. 151.

and obligations of the parties with respect to the sale specifically defined, by the express agreement of the parties. Where the power rests upon implication, the pledge cannot be sold without reasonable notice to the pledgeor of the time and place of sale, for the reason that he is entitled to redeem up to the very time of sale, and should be afforded opportunity to be present at the sale to see that it is fairly conducted, and procure bidders, if he should so desire. This requirement of notice may be waived by the pledgeor, either in the contract of pledge, or afterward; and by the agreement between the parties in this case, the bank was expressly authorized to sell the property pledged to it by Glidden, without notice. But there was no agreement that the bank might become the purchaser at any sale which should be made; and it is well settled that in the absence of an express agreement to that effect, a pledgee cannot, directly or indirectly, become a purchaser at his own sale, for the satisfactory reason that he holds the property in a fiduciary capacity which forbids the disposition of it for his personal benefit, and requires good faith and fidelity to the interests of the pledgeor, in making a sale of it. His duty as a seller is inconsistent with his interest as a purchaser; and the principle that a trustee cannot be a purchaser at his own sale is applicable. Story, Bailm. § 319; Torrey v. Bank of Orleans, 9 Paige, 649-663; Chouteau v. Allen, 70 Mo. 290, 335.

The purchase for the bank, by its president, at the auction sale of November 5, 1883, was therefore unauthorized, and its subse-

So, an express contract contained in a note, that stocks given as collateral security therefore should be sold after a certain specified time and in a particular manner, precludes the idea of implied authority to sell before the note becomes due or at any other place than that provided for. Dykens v. Allen, 7 Ill. 497, 42 Am. Dec. 87, 3 Ill. 594.

But a pledge of a promissory note with a power of sale in case of default does not authorize the pledgee to compromise with the maker of the note and take less than was due thereon, where the note was well secured and apparently worth its face value. Zimbleman v. Veeder, 98 Ill. 613.

And a sale by a pledgee of a negotiable promissory note under a contract conferring power to sell for an amount much less than the face value of the note, without notice to the pledgeor, will not be regarded as such a sale as the law requires, but rather as a compromise between the pledgee and the maker of the note. Ibid.

And the surrender by a pledgee of promissory notes as collateral security who has an express written authority to sell at public or private sale, for a sum less than is due thereon, but which is enough to pay the particular debt, is not a sale within the meaning of the power conferred, but is a compromise which renders the pledgee liable in an action on the notes to the pledgeor for the injury thereby sustained, and if at the same time he sells other collaterals of the same debtor the whole transaction being a tort, the pledgeor may recover for the whole. Union Trust Co. v. Rigdon, 93 Ill. 458.

So, trover will not lie against a pledgee of bonds deposited as collateral security where they are sold pursuant to the terms of the agreement of the parties made at the time of the deposit, to recover any surplus in his hands belonging to the depositor. Loomis v. Stave, 72 Ill. 623.

A sale by a pledgee of stocks at the board of brokers publicly and fairly made in parcels in the usual way to a third person is legal, however, terminating the pledge and vesting title in the purchaser under a contract authorizing him to sell for nonpayment without further notice. Maryland F. Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 244, 89 Am. Dec. 779.

And authority in a pledge of shares of stock to secure payment of loans to sell the shares on nonpayment of the notes secured at maturity without demand of payment or further notice warrants the holder upon the dishonor of the notes secured in selling the pledge at public or private sale without notice to redeem and without notice of sale. Jeanes's Appeal, 116 Pa. 573.

And a sale of hypothecated stock, made by a broker at private sale for the full market value of the stock, under authority in writing, signed by the pledgeor, expressly authorizing the pledgee to sell the pledge in case it is not redeemed by a specified day or to give the same to any broker to sell on that date, is valid where the pledge is not redeemed on the day specified. Bryson v. Rayner, 25 Md. 424, 90 Am. Dec. 69.

But authority to use, transfer, or hypothecate stock pledged to secure a note does not authorize a sale of the stock by the pledgeor for his own account before the note matures or becomes due. Ogden v. Lathrop, 1 Sweeney, 643.

And authority to a pledgee in a contract of pledge to sell stock pledged before maturity of the debt without notice, if the security should depreciate in value, will not warrant a sale of the pledge before maturity by a purchaser of the debt without notice, on the ground that the stock was fraudulently issued. Hulskamp v. West, 47 Fed. Rep. 236.

And authority to a creditor who holds collateral security to sell it before maturity of the debt in the event of such security or any part thereof depreciating in market value, gives him no right to sell on finding that corporate stock which forms a part of the security is not genuine and is therefore worthless. National Bank v. Baker, 128 Ill. 533, 4 L. R. A. 586, 27 Ill. App. 356.

A power of attorney given to an agent authorizing him to buy, sell, and transfer, at his discretion, gold, stocks, etc., and to draw, execute, and deliver all orders, checks, or other instruments in writing which shall or may, in his discretion, be necessary in the transaction of the business of purchasing and selling stocks on speculation, however, authorizes him to employ a broker to purchase and sell stocks and empower him to sell stocks purchased at public or private sale without notice whenever the margin should fall below a designated per cent, and in case of such employment a sale under such circumstances by the broker would not be wrongful, and any deficiency arising on such sale may be set up as a counterclaim in an action by the principal against the broker charging an unlawful sale. Wicks v. Hatch, 62 N. Y. 535, 6 Jones & S. 95.

But written authority to act for another in any stock transactions with certain brokers does not authorize the person holding it to direct the brokers to sell such stocks or interfere with the contract between the parties, where the person from whom he had the authority did not own the stock but held it for the purpose of using it as security in stock transactions, and where the brokers had notice of such ownership and the quent assumption of proprietorship unwarranted, unless ratified in some way by Glidden, which is not claimed; the sale was repudiated by him soon after he became aware of it, and ratification could not be presumed from his silence, for he was ignorant of the sale, and it was manifestly against his interest, having been made at a price much below the market value of the property. If the sale had been ratified, his right would have been to charge the bank with the price at which the property was so sold, and require the application of the proceeds, as of the date of the sale, toward the satisfaction of his debt and the charges against the property; and in that case he would have remained liable for the balance due on his debt. And, it appears to be established by the great weight of authority that such a sale, when repudiated by the pledgeor, is not a conversion, where no change has occurred in the actual condition and situation of the property. The relation of the parties remains the same as before the sale, the pledgee continuing to hold under the contract of pledge, leaving the title to the property and rights of the parties unaffected, as though no sale had been attempted. Indeed, in such case, it is said there is no sale for want of a competent purchaser. Bryan v. Baldwin, 52 N. Y. 232; Middlesex Bank v. Minot, 4 Met. 325; Stokes v. Frazier, 72 Ill. 428; Killian v. Hoffman, 6 Ill. App. 200; Maryland F. Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 242, 89 Am. Dec. 779; Bank of Old Dominion v. Dubuque & P. R. Co. 8 Iowa, 277, 74 Am. Dec. 302; Canfield v. Minneapolis Agricultural & Mechanical Asso. 4 McCrary, 646; Duncomb v. New York, H. & N. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 205; Halliday v. Holgate, L. R. 3 Exch. 299; Day facts of the case they are liable for such disposition as a conversion. Porter v. Parks, 49 N. Y. 564.

And an authority by a wife to her husband to raise money on her watch does not authorize the husband to consent to a sale of the watch by the pledgee, except in the ordinary mode after due notice as required by law, and where he authorizes such a sale and a sale is made without notice, the pledgee having knowledge of the facts, the sale is a conversion, and the title of the true owner is not divested, and her right to sue is complete. Van Arsdale v. Joiner, 44 Ga. 173.

A clause in an assignment of a note and mortgage as collateral security, providing that in case of default the pledgee might maintain immediately an action for the purpose of fixing the amount due and directing the note and mortgage to be sold by the sheriff, does not restrict the pledgee to a sale of the notes and mortgage or prevent him from foreclosing the mortgage. McArthur v. Magee, 114 Cal. 126.

And where a number of persons associated themselves together to purchase lands of a corporation, and it was arranged that the interest of the purchasers was to be divided into shares, and there was to be issued to each purchaser a certificate of the number of shares belonging to him on payment of 10 per cent of the purchase price in cash and the remainder in his bond secured by a pledge of his certificates, the fact that the agreement of the corporation for the improvement of the land sold was to be completed within a period which would expire before the bonds would become due, upon the expectation of all the parties that the land would be speedily sold after the completion of the improvements, does not show the intention that the pledgee should rely, as the means of meeting any default in payment of the bonds secured, upon dividends to be made from the proceeds of land to be sold, and not upon a sale of the certificates; but the ordinary right of foreclosure implied in a pledge of stock or personal property would be included. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Thompson, 133 Mass. 482.

The liability of a pledgee in an action by the pledgeor against a pledgee and purchaser, in which there is evidence that a negotiable note was pledged, and that the pledgeor upon being notified to redeem gave the pledgee authority to sell, and it was sold at what appeared to be an unreasonably low price, depends upon whether the pledgeor had in fact authorized the sale, and whether the purchase was made in good faith for a reasonable price, and an instruction to the jury that the liability of the purchaser depended on the question whether he had notice that the note was pledged, is erroneous. Brightman v. Reeves, 21 Tex. 70.

A pledgee under a written contract authorizing him to sell the thing pledged, however, is limited in his authority to sell to the articles named in the contract. Clark v. Bouvain, 20 La. Ann. 70.

And a pledgee of property for security for money advanced with the right to sell the property and satisfy the debt and pay over the balance of the price to the pledgeor, who exchanges the property for other property, exceeds his authority, and it would be optional with the pledgeor either to adopt or repudiate the act of making the exchange. Strong v. Adams, 30 Vt. 221, 73 Am. Dec. 305.

And one who exchanges stock owned by him for an equal number belonging to another, pledged to secure an indebtedness, cannot claim that he did not know the terms of the pledge, and did not consent that his stock should be sold at private sale without notice, where the exchange was made under such circumstances that the pledgee had the right to assume that the exchanged stock would become and remain the property of the pledgeor to be dealt with the same as the shares originally pledged. Smith v. Lee, 84 Fed. Rep. 557.

So, the holder of corporate stock who has pledged it as security for a debt of the corporation, under an agreement that bonds pledged by the corporation for the same debt should be first resorted to though the stock was void because issued without receiving the 75 per cent of its par value required by statute, may sue for a conversion of the stock by a sale thereof in violation of such agreement. Hinckley v. Pfister, 83 Wis. 64.

The Missouri statute giving to a pawn broker the right of absolute disposition of and ownership in pledges left with him as security for his debt after the failure to pay the interest on the principal debt or the debt itself for sixty days after maturity thereof, does not apply to a pledge of notes secured by deed of trust on real estate as collateral to the indebtedness represented by the note. Richardson v. Ashby, 132 Mo. 238.

And where a pledge is not redeemed at the expiration of a year and a day, the pawnbroker has the right under the English statute to expose it to sale as soon as he can consistently with the provisions of the act, but the failure to pay within that time does not absolutely lose all right to the pawnor: if at any time before the sale has actually taken place he tenders the principal, interest, and expenses incurred, v. Holmes, 103 Mass. 307, 311; Donald v. Suckling, L. R. 1 Q. B. 585.

The rule results from the nature of the contract between the parties. Under a contract of pledge the right of the pledgee to retain possession of the property continues until the debt or engagement for the security of which it was pledged has been discharged by payment or performance, or a tender, and demand for its return; and his obligation is to keep the article pledged, with due care, and restore it to the pledgeor upon the performance of his agreement. On the other hand, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, it is the duty of the debtor to seek the creditor at the proper place and pay the debt, or tender its payment, before he is entitled to receive back the pledge. These obligations of the parties are reciprocal, and neither can require performance by the other without himself being able and ready to perform on his part; so that, the possession of the pledgee being lawful as long as he retains the actual control and custody of the pledge, with the ability to perform his obligation by restoring it, he is not in default until a demand, accompanied by a tender of the debt, is made. If he then refuse or fail to restore the pledge, he may be charged with its value. The action for its recovery, though treated as one for conversion, is, in reality, founded on the breach of the contract, and hence the creditor is entitled to recoup his debt. Until the breach occurs no right of action accrues in favor of the pledgeor; suffering the debt to run unsatisfied after maturity does not destroy the pledgee's lien, or the pledgeor's right to redeem. Whelan v. Kinsley, 26 Ohio St. 131; Jones, Pledges, §§ 543, 566, 571.

he has a right to his goods, and in such case the right to sell is terminated, and if the pawn broker sells the owner is entitled to recover in trover for such sale. Walter v. Smith, 5 Barn. & Ald. 439, 1 Dowl. & R. 1.

2. Blank transfers of stock.

A pledge of stock as collateral security by the delivery of certificates with a blank transfer on the back signed by the owner confers power upon the pledgee where the principal indebtedness is past due to sell the stock, after giving the pledgeor reasonable notice to redeem and of the time and place of sale, that being the readiest mode of collection. Canfield v. Minneapolis Agri. & Mechanical Asso. 4 McCreary, 646; Ex parte Sargent, L. R. 17 Eq. 273, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 425, 22 Week. Rep. 815; France v. Clark, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 830, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 263, 48 L. T. N. S. 185, 31 Week. Rep. 374.

Such a transfer confers on the pledgee, not merely a power to complete his title by registration, but also a power to sell the shares. France v. Clark, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 830, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 263, 48 L. T. N. S. 185, 31 Week. Rep. 374.

And the transfer will pass the legal title if the articles of association do not require a deed, otherwise it will pass the equitable title. Ex parte Sargent, L. R. 17 Eq. 273, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 425, 22 Week. Rep. 815.

Thus, one who advances money in good faith to the holder of a certificate of stock with the power of attorney in blank annexed, which is expressed to be for value and is irrevocable on its face, taking it as collateral security, acquires a valid title as against the person by whom the power was executed and in whose name the stock stood, and is not bound to surrender it except upon repayment with interest of his whole advance, though such owner may have satisfied the debt for which he himself pledged it. Fatman v. Lobach, 1 Duer, 354.

And where an owner of stock delivers to and leaves with his brokers the certificates of the shares, having indorsed thereon the form of an assignment expressed to be made for value received and an irrevocable power to make all necessary transfers, he confers upon them such an apparent title to or power of disposition over the shares in question as will estop him from asserting his own title as against parties who take bona fide through the broker. McNeill v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, 7 Am. Rep. 341; Lacombe v. Forstall, 123 U. S. 562, 31 L. ed. 255.

In McNeill v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, 43 L. R. A.

7 Am. Rep. 341, Bush v. Lathrop, 22 N. Y. 535, infra, VIII. c. was distinguished and explained, that being a case of pledge of a bond and mortgage, the court saying that in no part of the opinion is it sought to apply the doctrine to shares in corporations or any other personal property, the legal title to which is capable of being transferred by assignment and the free transmission of which from hand to hand is essential.

And where certificates of stock are transferable by indorsement in blank and delivery on pledge, a bona fide purchaser or subsequent pledgee may hold them against the real owner, and is not liable to him therein in an action of trover. Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass. 389.

A certificate of stock deposited as collateral security for the payment of a loan, accompanied by irrevocable power of attorney to sell, assign, and transfer it, is prima facie evidence of equitable ownership in the whole, and may be held by any person in whose hands it is found where he is shown to be a holder for value without notice of the rights of the pledgeor. Mount Holly, L. & M. Turnp. Co. v. Ferree, 17 N. J. Eq. 117.

And a title of a holder for value without notice of a certificate of stock pledged as collateral security, accompanied by a power of attorney to sell or transfer it when disposed of by the pledgee, is in no wise affected by a provision in the charter or by-laws of the corporation that stock is transferable only on its books, such provision being intended merely for the protection and benefit of the corporation. Ibid.

And the owner of certificates of mining stock issued in the usual form in the name of and indorsed by certain persons as trustees, which were delivered to a creditor as collateral security and by the creditor delivered to another who had full knowledge of the former transactions, and thereafter delivered by such other to stock brokers to sell in the stock board, and sold, the brokers having no knowledge of the previous transactions, cannot assert his title to the certificates as against the brokers, though he had tendered the debt and demanded the return of the stock of the intermediate holders. Stone v. Marye, 14 Nev. 362.

And the owner of such certificates issued in the name of different parties and indorsed by them as trustees, who deposit them with a bank to be held as collateral security for any indebtedness then existing or thereafter to be incurred by reason of purchases or sales of stock that the bank might make for him, which stock is subsequently delivered by the bank with other

The pledgeor may, undoubtedly, refuse to recognize a sale made by the pledgee to himself when such a sale is not expressly authorized; but he cannot affirm it in part and reject it in part; he cannot adopt it so far as to make it effectual to transfer the title to the pledgee, and at the same time reject it as to the price and terms of the sale; nor can his rejection, which has the effect of defeating the pledgee's title under the sale, at the same time destroy the lien of the latter under the contract of pledge. The sale must be either accepted or rejected as an entirety; and when so rejected, and the pledgee remains in the possession and control of the property, with the ability to perform his contract by restoring it to the pledgeor on demand, the contract of pledge continues in force, and the pledgee's possession, being referable to the contract, is as lawful as before the sale, and therefore he can be charged with a conversion of the property only upon his refusal or failure to return it on the performance, or tender of performance, of the pledgeor's obligation. The observation sometimes met with in the opinions of judges, and in text-books, that the pledgeor is at liberty to treat an unauthorized sale of the pledged property as a conversion by the pledgee, must be taken to refer to such a sale as puts the property beyond the control of the pledgee. In cases of that kind the pledgeor may charge the pledgee as for a conversion of the property without demand or tender of performance; though he is not bound to do so, but may by subsequent tender and demand require the pledgee to account for the market value of the property at that time. And, of course, it is not the right of the pledgee to insist that his wrongful sale stocks to another as collateral security for the payment of a loan made by him to the bank, and for further advances that might be made, the lender having no knowledge of the ownership of the stock, cannot recover the value thereof of the second pledgee as for a conversion thereof. Gass v. Hampton, 16 Nev. 185.

So, executors are not entitled to recover for certificates of stock pledged as collateral security for the personal indebtedness of coexecutors against the last pledgee, where the certificates were accompanied by a blank bill of sale and power of attorney, and the pledgee pledged them to one who advanced money to him, supposing him to be the real owner, as the same principle which prevails in the case of an absolute owner applies in the case of an executor who invests the holder of certificates of stock with apparent ownership. Wood's Appeal, 92 Pa. 379, 37 Am. Rep. 694.

The delivery by a debtor to a creditor of stocks with a blank transfer by way of security, however, does not authorize the creditor to delegate to another person authority to fill up the blanks for purposes foreign to the original contract. France v. Clark, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 257, 50 L. T. N. S. 1, 36 Week. Rep. 466, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 585.

And one who without authority takes from another holding the same in pledge an instrument signed in blank by a third party, and fills up the blanks, cannot, even in the case of a negotiable instrument, claim to be a purchaser for value without notice, so as to acquire a greater right than the person from whom he received it. Ibid.

And where owners of shares of stock deposit the certificates with a signed transfer by way of security with another, with the understanding that they are not to be dealt with by the pledgee, and the pledgee does not put them upon the register or execute an acceptance of the shares, but fraudulently transfers them and hands them over with the previous transfer and certificates to mortgagees for value, such mortgagees cannot, after becoming aware of the true ownership, get their title perfected against the owner through further acts on the part of the mortgagor, which would be a continuation of his fraud, as they have no equity which will prevail against the owner. Ortigas v. Brown, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 168, 38 L. T. N. S. 145.

And where a firm of stock brokers, having bonds and shares of stock payable to bearer, and passing by delivery, belonging to a customer, in its possession for safe keeping, sells some of them, and contracts for a repurchase of 43 L. R. A.

similar securities for the same amount for the next settling day, and pledges the substituted securities with others belonging to the same owner to a bank to secure a loan from the bank in order to obtain funds to pay for the purchase, the substituted securities are the property of the original owner, and though the bank believed that the brokers were entitled to pledge the securities, if they did not believe that they had authority from the true owners to pledge them en bloc with other securities to raise a lump sum, they are not bona fide holders for value without notice, and the owner is entitled to recover such stocks or the value thereof from the bank. Simmons v. London Joint Stock Bank, 63 L. T. N. S. 789.

So, one with whom a registered holder of shares in a company whose articles of association do not require a transfer of shares to be by deed deposits the certificates of his shares accompanied by a transfer executed by himself with the name of the transferee and the date of execution left in blank with the transferee as security for a loan, no time being fixed for repayment of the loan, has no authority without previous demand for repayment to sell or sub-mortgage the shares, and if he does so, and a purchaser or mortgagee fills the blank with his own name, he acquires no title as against the original owner except to the extent of what was due him from his pledgeor or mortgagor. France v. Clark, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 830, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 362, 48 L. T. N. S. 185, 31 Week. Rep. 374, affirming L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 257, 50 L. T. N. S. 1, 36 Week. Rep. 466, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 585.

In the above case Ex parte Sargent, L. R. 17 Eq. 273, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 425, 22 Week. Rep. 815, was distinguished upon the ground that the question in that case was as to the legal right of a person to have a transfer on the register of members of a company, and that in that case the blanks were filled up by the first transferee.

III. Demand and notice.

a. Necessity of generally.

• A pledge to secure a loan of money to be repaid at a fixed time may be sold by the pledgee after the expiration of such time and a demand for repayment duly made, provided reasonable notice be also given to the pledgeor of the time and place of the intended sale, but in the absence of such notice the sale would be invalid. Richards v. Davis, 5 Clark (Pa.) 471; Almaworth v. Bowen, 9 Wis. 349.

• And a creditor to whom a pledge of property is given is bound to call for a redemption or give notice of sale before selling the property constitutes a conversion, for that would enable him, if he were allowed to do so, to take advantage of his own wrong, and by his own violation of the contract determine the time, and thus the measure, of his liability for its breach. As has already been stated, no offer was made by Glidden, at any time, to pay the debt he owed the bank, nor was any demand made for the return of the iron held in pledge; and, after it was bid off by the president of the bank, on the 5th day of November, 1883, it remained in the control of the bank, as it had been before, without change in any respect, up to the 7th day of February, 1887, when, under the sale that day made, part of the iron passed into other hands; so that until that time the bank's possession was lawful, and it was able to perform its obligation to Glidden by returning the iron to him upon payment of his debt. It had, up to that time, exercised no actual dominion or control over the property inconsistent with Glidden's right to redeem; and the sale of November 5, 1883, being ineffectual to transfer the title, did not, we think, constitute a conversion of the property, which, in legal contemplation, was still held under the contract of pledge.

But, by the sale of February 7, 1887, a part of the property pledged passed beyond the control of the bank, and it was thereafter no longer able to perform its contract with Glidden by making return of the iron to him; and if that sale was unauthorized by the terms of the pledge, he might rightfully claim there was then a conversion of the whole of the property without tender or demand by him. The obligation of the pledgee being to return all of the property pledged, a conversion of part may, at the election of pledged, where the debt was one which did not become due and payable until a future day certain, as well as where it became due and payable immediately. Stearns v. Marsh, 4 Denio, 227, 47 Am. Dec. 248.

- A sale by a pledgee without notice or a call for redemption of the property pledged is wrongful. Ibid.; Wilson v. Little, 1 Sandf. 351; Washburn v. Pond, 2 Allen, 474.

And where in a promissory note, the payment of which was secured by a deposit of specified chattels, it was stipulated that in case of the nonpayment of the note at maturity the payee might sell the collaterals after giving at least ten days' notice to the maker of the note, and the creditor sells the collaterals without giving such notice, the sale is a conversion thereof, especially when the seller also becomes the purchaser. Waring v. Gaskill, 95 Ga. 731.

- A creditor having property pledged to him as security for his debt cannot sell it until he has called upon the debtor to redeem, and given him notice of the time and place of sale. Stevens v. Hurlbut Bank, 31 Conn. 146; Castello v. City Bank, 1 N. Y. Legal Obs. 25; Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 125; Robertson v. Lippincott, 1 Phila. 308; Conyngham's Appeal, 57 Pa. 474; and see Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392, 5 Duer, 29; Morgan v. Dow, 3 Colo. 551; Lockett v. Towneend, 3 Tex. 119, 49 Am. Dec. 736; Bates v. Wiles, 1 Handy (Ohio) 532, infra, IV.

- And a pledgee electing to sell a pledge without resort to judicial proceedings must, in the absence of agreement, make the sale at public auction upon reasonable notice of the time and place to the pledgeor that he may have opportunity to redeem. Sharpe v. National Bank, 87 Ala. 644; Diller v. Brubaker, 52 Pa. 498, 91 Am. Dec. 177; Davis v. Funk, 39 Pa. 243, 80 Am. Dec. 519; Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392, 5 Duer, 29; Little v. Barker, Hoffm. Ch. 487.

And where a sale is made without notice, the pledgeor is entitled to maintain an action for an accounting. Diller v. Brubaker, 52 Pa. 498, 91 Am. Dec. 177.

And it amounts to a conversion of the pledge which renders the pledgee liable to the pledgeor in an action for conversion. Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 125.

A sale of a pledge is not valid so as to protect the pledgee making it where it was without a previous demand of payment and notice to the pledgeor. Lewis v. Graham, 4 Abb. Pr. 110.

And a pledgee has no right to sell until after demand and notice, and if he does so without demand and notice to a party having full knowledge, no absolute title passes and the 43 L. R. A.

property remains in the hands of the purchaser as a pledge, and the pledgeor may maintain a suit in equity to enforce the performance of the trust. Dewey v. Bowman, 8 Cal. 145.

One who receives a bond as collateral security for an indebtedness of the pledgeor to him assumes the duty resulting from that relation or notifying the pledgeor of the time and place of sale thereof in case of nonpayment of the indebtedness before disposing of the same, or, in case of neglect so to do, to account to him for the value thereof. Washburn v. Pond, 2 Allen, 474.

And a sale of stock by a pledgee is illegal and a conversion thereof, where it was pledged to secure a loan payable on demand, and a reasonable time to make payment was not allowed between the time of the demand and notice and the sale. Genet v. Howland, 45 Barb. 560.

The rule that a sale of stock by a pledgee is not valid unless made at public auction upon reasonable notice of time and place, and that it cannot be made at a board of brokers unless otherwise agreed, applies even in a case where the hypothecation was general and no specification of the mode or time of sale was made, and the pledgee had applied to the borrower to repay the debt, notifying him that he would sell in case of nonpayment. Castello v. City Bank, 1 N. Y. Legal Obs. 25.

An attempt to sell property pledged by sending it to a market for that purpose without notice to the owner and without offer to deliver it or demand payment of the lien is in itself a conversion which destroys the lien and renders unnecessary a demand by the owner before commencing suit to obtain possession. Vincent v. Conklin, 1 E. D. Smith, 203.

A pledgeor is entitled to notice of the time and place of sale of the thing pledged unless his right has been waived or surrendered by consent, and in case of failure to give it the pledgee becomes liable for the value of the thing pledged. Milliken v. Dehon, 10 Bosw. 325.

And a pledgee of a bond as collateral security for an indebtedness due him, who sells the bond without notice to the pledgeor of the time and place of sale, is not relieved from liability by a subsequent notice to the pledgeor that he might redeem the bond within thirty days at the same price and expense. Washburn v. Pond, 2 Allen, 474.

And a bank loaning money to a customer and taking a pledge of shares of stock as collateral to the indebtedness has no right to sell the shares without first demanding payment of the debt and giving him notice of the intention to sell, and cannot sell at private sale for less the pledgeor, be treated as a conversion of all, for he is entitled to the return of the very thing pledged, and is not obliged to accept a part of it only. Nor is a tender of payment and demand for the property necessary where the pledgee has put it out of his power to comply with the demand, and make restoration of the pledge, in order to entitle the pledgeor to maintain an action for its wrongful sale. Such tender and demand, when the pledgee has thus incapacitated himself to perform his part of the contract, are excused because the act would be a useless ceremony which the law never requires. Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cal. Cas. 200; Alden v. Pearson, 3 Gray, 342; Fletcher v. Dickinson, 7 Allen, 23; Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443, 51 Am. Dec. 307.

than its fair market price, and where it takes less he is responsible to the pledgeor for the difference between that amount and the market value of the stock. Nabring v. Bank of Mobile, 58 Ala. 204.

So, a transfer of a bill of lading of a quantity of flour for which a receipt was given by which it was stipulated that the flour was to be used as security for the owner's note and that the sale of it was to be under his direction, is a pledge, and the pledgee has no right to sell the flour until payment of the note is demanded and reasonable notice of the intended sale is given, and where it is sold without notice the owner may, after offering to pay the note and expenses and demanding the flour, maintain an action against the pledgee for its conversion. Jaroslauski v. Saunderson, 1 Daly, 232.

And that a sale made by a consignee to reimburse himself for advances upon a cargo was made in good faith is no defense in an action against him by the consignor for damages for selling without notice of sale or calling upon him for reimbursement, as the consignee has no right to sell to reimburse himself without notice to the consignor and calling on him for reimbursement, and if he does so the consignor may maintain an action against him for the damages thereby caused. Porter v. Patterson, 15 Pa. 229.

So, the inability of a pledgee to make a demand and give notice of the time and place of sale of a pledge, does not entitle him to sell without such demand or notice, and without judicial proceedings. Strong v. National Mechanics' Bkg. Asso. 45 N. Y. 718.

Though where stocks and bonds of a corporation are pledged they may upon default be sold for the debt, the sale must be at public auction and can only be made after demand of payment and notice to the pledgeor of the time and place of sale, and if the pledgeor cannot be found so that a personal demand may be made upon him, the pledgee must resort to proceedings at law for a judicial sale. Indiana & I. C. R. Co. v. McKernan, 24 Ind. 62.

But it has been held that where bonds are pledged by a bank as security for the performance of an agreement, and the pledgee is empowered to sell them in case of a breach of the agreement on thirty days' notice of sale, and the bank afterwards fails and closes its place of business, and thereafter transacts no business and has no office or officers, and fails to perform the agreement, a sale of the pledge may be made without notice to the bank on the ground that the giving of notice had been rendered impossible by the act of the pledgeor, such sale not rendering the pledgee liable as for a conversion of the bonds. City Bank v. Babcock, Holmes, 180. 43 L. R. A.

Whether the sale of February 7, 1887, was made in violation of the agreement between the parties, so as to render the bank liable for the market value of the property at that date, or whether that and the subsequent sales were made in pursuance of the power conferred by the contract, which, if so made would limit the bank's liability to the amount of the net proceeds of those sales, are questions not now before us, and upon which we express no opinion. Issues of fact are joined by the pleadings concerning them upon which the parties are entitled to have a trial by jury.

In the decision of the question, upon which the judgment below was reversed, the circuit court, we think, committed no error, and its judgment is affirmed.

Where no agreement was made as to notice in a contract between a broker and a customer for whom he bought and sold pork and lard on the board of trade, and the broker is compelled to secure himself against losses by a sale, the transaction is to be governed by the rules of the board of trade. Denton v. Jackson, 106 Ill. 433.

A sale of county bonds held as collateral security by a pledgee without notice is not wrongful, however, though the pledgeor was entitled to notice, where it appears that he had actual knowledge of the time and place and reasonable time before the sale was to take place. Alexandria, L. & H. R. Co. v. Burke, 22 Gratt. 254.

And some of the cases have appeared to dispense with notice under some circumstances. Thus, the want of notice of sale of stock pledged will not affect bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration where a power of attorney to transfer was delivered by the pledgeor to the pledgee with the stock pledged. Conyngham's Appeal, 57 Pa. 474.

And where gold is held by way of pledge or security, the pledgee may sell it upon giving reasonable notice in case of default, and no allegation in an action by the pledgee for a balance due of tender of the gold or notice to redeem is necessary. Schepeler v. Elmer, 3 Daly, 11. Affirmed 54 N. Y. 673.

b. When term for redemption or payment is indefinite.

Where no time is expressly fixed by contract between the parties for the payment of a debt secured by a pledge, the pledgee cannot sell the pledge without a previous demand of payment, although the debt is technically due immediately, and though he had been authorized to sell without notice in case of nonpayment. Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443, 51 Am. Dec. 307.

Where the time of redemption is indefinite the pawnee cannot sell it without notice to the pledgeor, and if he does so the pledgeor may maintain an action for damages for a refusal to retransfer it. De Lisle v. Priestman, 1 Browne (Pa.) 176.

Where a pledge is delivered without any specified time of payment or redemption, the pledgeor has his whole lifetime to redeem, and if the pledgee sells the pledge before application or notice to redeem he is answerable for the value at the time of the application. Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cal. Cas. 200.

And a sale of stock hypothecated to secure a note under an agreement authorizing the sale thereof in case of nonpayment without notice at public or private sale, without notice thereof or demand that the note should be paid, may be treated as a conversion, where the time of payment had been extended indefinitely, and where the purchase was made by the pledgee, the pledgor would be entitled to redeem on payment or tender of the principal debt. Greer v. Lafayette County Bank, 128 Mo. 559.

In Barrow v. Paxton, 5 Johns. 260, 4 Am. Dec. 354, it was said with reference to the case of Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cal. Cas. 200, by Kent, Ch. J., that that case was never decided by the court, that it was argued once and he prepared the written opinion which appears in the report of Mr. Calnes, but the court directed a second argument which for some reason or other was never brought on, so that no decision took place on the points raised in the cause.

So, while one who makes an advance upon an assignment of cotton under an agreement that should there be a decline in the market price the consignor should on demand deposit cash sufficient to cover such decline, and if he failed to do so or repay the advance at a fixed date, the consignee might sell the cotton for the most it would bring, can sell in the usual mode where the consignor fails to make good a decline in the market price, without giving notice of his intention or of the time or place of sale, he is bound to give notice of a decline and make an actual demand for the margin, though such demand need not be a personal one. Milliken v. Dehon, 27 N. Y. 364.

Some of the earlier cases draw a distinction between ordinary pledges of stock and stocks purchased and held by brokers for customers as security for advances made by them, and it has even been intimated that no notice at all is necessary in case of a sale of stocks pledged.

Thus, the notice required in the case of a sale of pledged stock as security for the payment of money advanced thereon is not required in case of a purchase by brokers as agents advancing money therefor, but the brokers must give the customer notice that his margin is diminished and that they require a further margin, and a reasonable time must be given within which to comply with the demand before the stock can be sold. Hanks v. Drake, 49 Barb. 186.

So, in Sterling v. Jaudon, 48 Barb. 459, it was held that notice of the time and place of sale for failure to maintain a margin applies to a pledge of stock or other securities for the payment of a debt only, and does not apply to the time and place of purchase, where a customer employs a broker to sell short and upon a failure to maintain a margin the broker buys for the customer to fill the order at a large loss.

And in Worthington v. Tormey, 34 Md. 182, it was said in case of sales of some kinds of pledges such as heirlooms, plate, and other articles of like character and description which possess a peculiar value to the owner, or which cannot readily be replaced, it is right and necessary to give notice to the pledgor of both the time and place of sale that he may have an opportunity of redeeming or attending and protecting his interests, but that the same reason does not apply in case of sales of stocks, as one share is exactly similar to and of the same value as another of the same company, and can be readily purchased to replace that sold if desirable.

This idea, however, would seem to have been entirely overthrown, at any rate in New York, by later well-considered cases.

Thus, the relation existing between a customer and a stock broker with reference to stocks purchased by the broker on a margin for the customer is that of pledgor and pledgee, and if the broker sells the stock without demanding additional margin or giving the customer reasonable notice of the sale, it will be wrongful and operate as a conversion. Gillett v. Whiting, 120 N. Y. 402; Baker v. Drake, 66 N. Y. 518, 23 Am. Rep. 80; Read v. Lambert, 10 Abb. Fr. N. S. 428.

A broker employed to purchase and sell stocks, who purchases stock with his own funds and in his own name and afterwards sells them to realize his advances without demanding payment of the price and without transferring or offering to transfer them to his principal and without notice of his intention, thereby disabling himself from making the necessary transfer or tender, in effect converts the stock to his own use, and loses all right of action against the principal that he might otherwise have had. Merwin v. Hamilton, 6 Duer, 244.

And while parties may agree that a broker may sell stocks purchased by him without notice when they fall in price, so that the margin does not cover the difference between current rates and prices paid, he cannot do so, in the absence of special authority, without giving his principal opportunity to increase his margin, and hold the stock for a favorable change in the market. Ritter v. Cushman, 35 How. Pr. 384.

Where stocks are held by a broker for a customer on a margin, it is a part of the contract that if the stock depreciates the margin shall be kept good on demand, and upon failure to do so the stocks may be sold upon reasonable and customary notice, but where the stock depreciates and a call for additional margin is made and complied with, and afterwards a second call is made which is not complied with, and the brokers sell the stock without notice, the sale is irregular and constitutes a conversion. Gruman v. Smith, 81 N. Y. 25.

So, the rule has been laid down that a custom among brokers to sell stocks deposited with them as collateral security for call loans at the board on failure of the borrower to pay on the date on which demand is made is not illegal as to parties familiar with and dealing on the basis of such custom. Colket v. Ellis, 10 Phila. 375.

It has been held, upon the other hand, however, that a custom in a designated place between brokers and their customers by which the brokers have a right to sell out a customer's stock on the exhaustion of the margin would be in hostility to the terms of the contract between them and an attempt to change its obligation, and is not therefore admissible in an action by a customer against a broker for an alleged wrongful sale of his stocks. Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235.

In the above case Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443, 51 Am. Dec. 307, supra, III. b, was distinguished upon the ground that that was a case of a formal pledge and therefore not an authority in the present case.

But evidence of a custom in a broker's office to sell stocks in pledge at the public board of brokers for want of margin without notice to the pledgor of the time and place of sale is admissible in evidence in an action by a customer against a broker for a conversion of his stock by sale without notice, where it was agreed between the parties that all transactions in stocks should be in every way subject to the usages of the broker's office. Baker v. Drake, 66 N. Y. 518, 23 Am. Rep. 80.

And an arrangement by which stock brokers are employed by a customer to buy certain stocks on his account and carry them for him on paying and keeping with them a designated margin, authorizing a sale without notice in case of his failure to keep the margin good, is a contract of pledge and the pledgee is bound first to call upon the pledgor to make good his margin, and, failing in that, the pledgeor is entitled to notice of the time and place where the stock would be sold, which time and place must be reasonable. Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235.

But a contract by which a broker purchases stocks as agent for a customer and advances money therefor, upon condition that the customer deposits a margin of a designated per cent and a further margin when required by the agent, is not a pledge of stocks for payment of the money advanced requiring notice of the time and place of selling the pledge for nonpayment to render the sale legal. Smith v. Savin, 69 Hun, 311, 30 Abb. N. C. 192.

In the above case Thompson v. St. Nicholas Nat. Bank, 113 N. Y. 325, infra, VI., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the pledgee acted in pursuance of and under the power conferred by the contract of pledge, and it was immaterial therefore what ulterior rights there were of which it had no notice at the time of the making of the pledge, the waiver of right of notice of the time and place of sale and personal demand being a part of the contract of pledge.

In the absence of any contract between a broker and customer with regard to notice of sale, and of any rule of the board of trade, the common law would govern regarding reasonable notice and opportunity to the customer to make his margin good in order to justify the sale. Denton v. Jackson, 106 Ill. 483.

d. Under special contract.

The rule that a pledgee of personal property must demand payment of the pledgeor before sale, and give him notice of the time and place of the intended sale, may be waived by agreement of the parties. Chouteau v. Allen, 70 Mo. 290.

And an express waiver by a pledgeor of stock of notice of sale is broad enough to include notice of the reasons for making it, and a pledgee having such authority, wishing to sell because he regards the security as depreciating in value, or for any other reason, may do so without any formal announcement of the reason on which he exercises his power. McDougall v. Hazleton Tripod Boiler Co. 60 U. S. App. 209, 88 Fed. Rep. 217, 81 C. C. A. 487.

Where the parties to a pledge agreed to have it sold at public or private sale without notice, the pledgeor cannot insist that he should have notice, and no question can arise as to the mode of sale or want of notice. Genet v. Howland, 45 Barb. 580.

The rule that a pledgee of personal property must demand payment of the pledgeor before selling, and give him notice of the time and place of the intended sale, does not apply where a power of sale without notice is given, and where by the contract a definite time is fixed for the payment of the debt. Chouteau v. Allen, 70 Mo. 290.

And where a debt secured by a pledge was payable at a fixed time, and by the terms of the contract no demand of payment was necessary, sale without notice being expressly authorized, a sale made under the contract in pursuance thereof cannot be treated as a conversion of the property though no notice was given, and all that the pledgeor would be entitled to receive was what the property brought in excess of the amount loaned, and interest thereon. Harris v. Thomas, 37 Ill. App. 517.

And in Illinois and Maryland the rule is that an authority to sell property pledged either at public or private sale, saying nothing as to notice, is a waiver of notice to the pledgeor of the time and place of sale.

Thus, where a pledge is made upon a special contract with reference to sale for nonpayment conferring the right to sell, but which is silent as to the question of notice, it will be intended that a power of sale was conferred without notice. McDowell v. Chicago Steel Works, 124 Ill. 491.

And a contract between a pledgeor and pledgee of stock as collateral for a loan, that if said loan was not properly paid according to agreement the collaterals might be sold for the payment of the debt without further notice, waives and dispenses with all notice of the time and place of sale when the power arises, leaving the pledgee only under the obligation to sell publicly and fairly for the best price he can obtain. Maryland F. Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 242, 89 Am. Dec. 779.

In New York, however, the contrary rule has been adopted. Thus, an agreement between a pledgeor and pledgee that in default of payment the pledgee might sell at public or private sale and pay the debt and expenses does not have the effect to waive notice of the sale so as to relieve the pledgee from liability as for conversion for selling the pledge without notice. Haskins v. Patterson, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 120; Milliken v. Dehon, 10 Bosw. 325.

So, stock pledged to secure a loan payable on demand cannot be lawfully sold until a demand for the payment of the loan is made, and a reasonable time allowed for such payment, though the contract provided that sale might be made upon default without notice. Genet v. Howland, 45 Barb. 580.

And a pledgee of stock certificates deposited with him, by a customer, as margin, or conditional security against loss while carrying other stocks for the depositor, has no legal right secretly or without knowledge or notice to the pledgeor to sell stock pledged, though a power of attorney from the owner was annexed authorizing the transfer of the scrip, the purpose of such power of attorney being to put the pledge in condition to be available as such in case of default. McNeil v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 55 Barb. 59.

In the above case, Crocker v. Crocker, 81 N. Y. 507, 88 Am. Dec. 291, infra, VIII. c, was distinguished upon the ground that in the present case there never was any title in the brokers, or any agency to make an absolute sale without notice, and no consent to the use of the pledge to borrow money was ever given, and its use was unknown and unauthorized, while in that case its use was known and authorized.

So, an agreement between a pledgeor and pledgee, made upon receipt of the property pledged, that if the original indebtedness should not be promptly paid at maturity, the pledgee should have the right and privilege of disposing of the pledge at private sale, and apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of the debt, and pay the balance to the pledgeor, changes the legal rights of the parties only by dispensing with notice to the pledgeor to redeem before making a sale. Robinson v. Hurley, 11 Iowa, 410, 79 Am. Dec. 497.

And authority given to a pledgee upon a pledge of promissory notes, that if the debt is not paid at maturity he may make the money out of the notes in the best way he can, and that he may sell the notes for that purpose, does not authorize him in case of such nonpayment to sell the notes without notice to the debtor to redeem and of the time and place of sale. Goldsmith v. First M. E. Church, 25 Minn. 202.

And an authority in a conveyance of shares of insurance company stock as collateral security to sell the same at the brokers' board or at public sale at the creditor's discretion, and authority to use, transfer, or hypothecate the same at his option, the creditor being required on payment or tender at the proper time of the amount loaned and interest to return an equal quantity of such security, does not warrant a sale of the stock made before any default and without any notice of any kind to the debtor, but where the pledgee upon demand returns the same quantity of similar stock, no wrong is committed. Ogden v. Lathrop, 65 N. Y. 158.

So, the sale by a broker of stocks purchased by him for a customer and carried upon a margin, without making any demand for more margin, is wrongful and unauthorized, rendering him liable to a customer, though the contract between the parties authorized a sale in the event of a noncompliance with a demand for more margin without notice. Stenton v. Jerome, 54 N. Y. 480.

And one to whom collaterals have been pledged to secure a debt with authority under certain circumstances to sell them before its maturity must before sale give notice to the pledgeor to redeem in case he elects to sell upon the happening of a contingency of which the pledgeor may be in profound ignorance. National Bank v. Baker, 128 Ill. 533, 4 L. R. A. 586.

And a contract between a customer and a firm of stock brokers by which they undertook to purchase such stocks as he should direct and pay for, and hold them for him and resell as he should direct, for which they were to receive a fixed rate of interest and a commission, and he was to keep on deposit a margin of 5 per cent of the value of the purchase as security against depreciation and loss, which margin was to be constantly kept good, confers no right upon the broker to sell stock thus carried without notice to or knowledge of the customer, although the price sank so low that the collaterals deposited were no longer equal to the margin required. Brass v. Worth, 40 Barb. 648.

The notice required under a contract between stock brokers and a customer by which they were to purchase and carry stock for him and he was to maintain a margin of 5 per cent security, where the security sinks below 5 per cent, is not a notice to redeem, but a notice to make the margin good, or that the brokers would proceed to sell and apply the proceeds to reimburse themselves for money advanced with interest and commissions. Ibid.

On this subject, see also cases supra, II. c. 1.

e. Sufficiency of.

The sufficiency of the demand and notice would seem to depend upon the differing circumstances of each particular case.

Reasonableness of the time and place of sale seems to be the primary requisite. See Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235.

Thus, a demand of payment by a pledgee by letters which were received and a subsequent letter sent to the pledgeor demanding payment and giving notice of the sale of the stocks pledged, thirty-four days before the sale, specifying that the property would be sold at an appointed time, is sufficient as to property originally pledged, but would not include property subsequently pledged as an additional security. Lewis v. Graham, 4 Abb. Pr. 110.

And a notice of the sale of municipal bonds pledged as collateral security for money loaned, published in a newspaper printed in the city where the bonds were issued thirty days before the sale, and also in a newspaper published in a neighboring city in which they were sold for more than they could have been sold for in the city where they were issued, is sufficient to render the sale valid, where no fraud is shown. Stokes v. Frasier, 72 Ill. 428.

So, the notice required in case of failure to redeem a pledge is not of the time and place of sale but of the intention of the pledgee to enforce his lien, so as to warn the pledgeor that he must redeem in time, and a notice that if the pledgeor did not pay the amount and take the property pledged away the pledgee would sell it according to agreement, to which the pledgeor made no objection, but promised to call the following week and arrange it, is sufficient to constitute a defense in an action of trover for the conversion of the pledge by a sale thereof. Haskins v. Patterson, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 120.

And two days' notice of sale of stock held as collateral security to a promissory note under an authority containing no restrictions as to the mode of selling the stock in case of nonpayment to be made at a board of brokers in the city of New York will be deemed sufficient to support the sale where there was no objection either to the length of the notice or the place of sale. Willoughby v. Comstock, 3 Hill. 389.

And a formal written notice of sale with a copy of the advertisements thereto annexed, signed by the auctioneer by whom the sale was made and left at the place of business of the pledgeor with a person in charge thereof two days before the sale, is sufficient to justify a sale by a pledgee of stock pledged, though the pledgeor testifies that he had no recollection of having received the notice. Bryan v. Baldwin, 7 Lans. 174.

And a notice by a pledgee, given on the 13th of the month, to return the whole of a loan on the 14th thereof, is sufficient under a contract for return of the loan upon one day's notice, and that if the loan was not promptly paid the pledgee was authorized without further notice to sell the said collateral for payment of the debt to justify a sale of the collateral made on the 20th of that month. Maryland F. Ins. Co. v. Dairymple, 25 Md. 242, 89 Am. Dec. 779.

So, a notice sent by a pledgee to a pledgeor to inform him of the sale of his pledge consisting of stocks by mail is sufficient to bind him, though upon the day it was sent he was in the place from which it was sent, and did not receive it until later. Worthington v. Tormey, 34 Md. 182.

And a pledgeor who relies upon his distance away as an objection to the sufficiency of a notice of the sale of stock pledged must show that the time of transmission by mail was such as to deprive him of the benefit of the notice in order to invalidate the sale made on such notice. Lewis v. Graham, 4 Abb. Pr. 110.

So, refusal to submit to the jury the question as to what was a reasonable time, in an action by a customer against a stock broker for the illegal sale of securities belonging to him, is not error where the time covered by the evidence was thirty days. Colt v. Owens, 90 N. Y. 368.

But two hours' time after notice by a broker to a customer that his margin is diminished requiring a further margin before selling, where no time is specified for compliance, cannot be held, as matter of law, to be reasonable time for performance. Hanks v. Drake, 49 Barb. 186.

And where in a former transaction between the same parties brokers had given to a customer notice that his margin was diminished, and made a demand that it be made good, which demand was complied with the next morning, which was satisfactory to the brokers, the customer in a subsequent transaction has the right to suppose that the same course of dealing would be expected upon receiving a similar notice, and if a quicker compliance is required the notice should so specify in order to validate a sale made for noncompliance. Ibid.

So, a sale of securities by a pledgee to reimburse himself is not rendered invalid for want of personal notice to the pledgee, where it appears that the pledgee was absent in Europe, and that notice was given at his place of business to a person appointed his agent during his absence, with full power to do all things that he might do if personally present. Potter v. Thompson, 10 R. I. 1.

And a notice by a pledgee of stock to the pledgee that the stock would be sold is not rendered insufficient to support the sale by the fact that it named no place, where it appears that that particular stock was for sale generally at one place only, and that the pledgee had knowledge of that fact. Worthington v. Torney, 34 Md. 182.

But the object to be attained by the giving of notice of sale of a pledge by the pledgee to the pledgee is to afford the debtor an opportunity to redeem and to be present at the sale to see and know that it is fairly conducted and the property disposed of to the best advantage, and a disposition after notice of intention to sell without saying when, or where, or in what manner it will be made, deprives the debtor of the substantial right and is illegal. Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392.

And a notice without date or signature left in the office of a pledgee of stock, that if a specified amount of the loan was not paid the stock would be used, does not constitute a demand which will mature the loan which was payable on demand, and authorize a sale of the stock. Genet v. Howland, 45 Barb. 560.

Nor is a notice by a pledgee that he will sell unless an excessive sum is paid immediately, such a notice as will justify a sale or relieve him from liability as for a conversion in case he sells. Pigot v. Cubley, 15 C. B. N. S. 701, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 134, 10 Jur. N. S. 818, 9 L. T. N. S. 804, 12 Week. Rep. 467.

And an offer by a pledgee of stock as collateral to an indebtedness, which he was about to sell because the debtor declined to pay another debt to another person not included in the pledge, to accept the amount of his own debt, will not render the sale valid and prevent its being a conversion of the stock, where it was made immediately before the sale so that the debtor did not have reasonable time within which to comply with the offer. Blood v. Erie Dime Sav. & L. Co. 164 Pa. 95.

So, a notice by a pledgee, given after the debt has matured, that if it is not paid within a specified time the pledgee will make the best disposition he can of the notes pledged to raise the money either by public or private sale, is not sufficient under a power to make the money out of the notes in the best way he can, and to sell the notes for that purpose. Goldsmidt v. First M. E. Church, 25 Minn. 202.

And a sale of dock warrants for brandy in dock by a pledgee with whom they were deposited as security for a loan made on the 28th day of January, and the delivery of the warrants to the purchaser on the 29th, the purchaser taking possession on the 30th, is a conversion of the warrants by the pledgee, though the owner was bankrupt and would not have redeemed. Johnson v. Stear, 15 C. B. N. S. 330, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 130, 10 Jur. N. S. 99, 9 L. T. N. S. 538, 12 Week. Rep. 347.

And a bank holding stocks as collateral security, with the right to sell them if the indebtedness was not paid within a reasonable time, with no arrangement as to the time or manner of sale, which made a conditional sale of the stocks without previous notice, which was to take effect if the debtor did not pay on a certain day, giving him notice to that effect, whereupon he remonstrated and asked to be allowed another day, which was refused, is liable to him for damages for such disposition of the stock where he procured the means and was ready to pay the greater part of the debt on the day following. Stevens v. Hurlbut Bank, 31 Conn. 146.

So, one who furnished a margin and directed a broker to purchase stock and bonds for him with his own money upon a commission, under an agreement that the broker could hold them until a specified day and then sell them, and that the customer should watch the margin value of the stock and bonds while they were so held and keep the margin good, is not in default where the margin was good on Saturday, but prices fell on that day, so that on Monday it was not good, by reason of not having anticipated the decline and given additional security on that day, and a sale thereof by the brokers upon the meeting of the board is unauthorized and illegal, rendering them liable for the market value of the stock and bonds on the last day of the period during which they had agreed to hold them. Andrews v. Clerke, 3 Bosw. 585.

And under an agreement between a stock broker and a customer that the broker was to purchase and carry stocks for the customer upon his direction, and be allowed therefor interest upon the money until reimbursed, and commissions, and that the customer should maintain a distinct margin if the broker has a right to sell the stocks purchased on the failure of the customer to maintain the required margin, a sale made upon a particular day, when there was a clear understanding between the parties that the customer was to make good his margin on that day and in default thereof the stock should be sold, is wrongful, and leaves the broker liable for the damages caused thereby, as the understanding would constitute a waiver of the customer's default in failing to maintain the margin, and he would not be at liberty to sell until after that day. Morgan v. Jaudon, 40 How. Pr. 366.

Proof that a pledgee had been pressing a pledgee for payment, and that he was making efforts to raise money, is sufficient to show a demand for payment, which in case of failure to make it would authorize a sale of the stock pledged by the pledgee. Carson v. Iowa City Gas Light Co. 80 Iowa, 638.

And an offer by a pledgee of stock as collateral, made to the pledgee, to take a specified amount of money for the collateral, which the pledgee entertained and tried to raise the money to pay it, and proof that the note secured by the pledge had been sent to the pledgee, and that papers had been put in the hands of an attorney for collection, sufficiently show a demand for payment of the note to mature it and warrant a sale of the pledge by the pledgee. McDougall v. Hazelton Tripod Boiler Co. 60 U. S. App. 209, 88 Fed. Rep. 217, 81 C. C. A. 487.

IV. Conduct of sale.

The general rule is that in the absence of a special authority property pledged can only be sold at public auction. Diller v. Brubaker, 52 Pa. 498, 91 Am. Dec. 177; Davis v. Funk, 39 Pa. 243, 80 Am. Dec. 519; Wheeler v. Newbould, 5 Duer, 29; Rankin v. McCulloch, 12 Barb. 103; Little v. Barker, Hoffm. Ch. 487; Morgan v. Dod, 3 Colo. 551; Sharpe v. National Bank, 87 Ala. 644. And see Brown v. Ward, 3 Duer, 660, supra, II. b. 3; Indiana & I. C. R. Co. v. McKernan, 24 Ind. 62, supra, III. a.

And that in the absence of express authority a pledgee has no legal right to dispose of stock pledged at private sale, and in case he does so the pledgee is entitled to maintain his action therefor either in trover or in case. Baltimore Marine Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 269. And see Nabring v. Bank of Mobile, 58 Ala. 204, supra, III. a.

Thus, a party with whom stock is hypothecated after having called for a redemption, and apprised the pledgee of his intention to sell and after offering it at the board of brokers in New York, cannot sell at private sale without any notice to the pledgee of the time and place. Castello v. City Bank, 1 N. Y. Legal Obs. 25.

And the sale by a pledgee of bonds specifically pledged as security for an advance at private sale is unauthorized and wrongful, and the pledgee may elect either to affirm it and claim the benefit thereof or repudiate it and hold the pledgee responsible for the bonds. Strong v. National Mechanics' Bkg. Asso. 45 N. Y. 718.

But a pledgee whose property pledged as security is sold at private sale with his consent or by his direction cannot afterwards object that such sale was not authorized by law. Hamilton v. State Bank, 22 Iowa, 306.

So, a sale of bonds deposited with a bank as collateral by the cashier at private sale to a director of the bank, who was also security for the debt secured for a sum clearly less than their value, is fraudulent and void. Dana v. Buckeye Coal & C. Co. 38 Ill. App. 371.

And where a sale is made of a negro boy held in pledge for an indebtedness of the owner without notice to him, which was not a public sale at auction, and the purchase was made by one who had full knowledge of the fact, he at most acquires only the title of his vendor, the pledgee, and the owner is entitled to redeem. Luckett v. Townsend, 3 Tex. 119, 49 Am. Dec. 738.

And a usage and custom in a city to sell notes and drafts pledged after demand of payment and notice that such sale would be made in default of payment, at private sale for the best price that could be obtained and not at public sale or auction, is inadmissible in evidence in an action for conversion of the pledge by such disposition, as the usage is in contradiction of the fair legal import of the contract between the parties. Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392.

And in McLemore v. Hawkins, 46 Miss. 715, it was doubted whether a valid sale of a note pledged could be made by the pledgee to the maker at private sale without the consent of the pledgee.

As to special authority for private sale, see Jeanes's Appeal, 116 Pa. 573; and Smith v. Lee, 84 Fed. Rep. 557, supra, II. c. 1.

So, a sale of stocks pledged as security at a board of brokers is a private, and not a public, sale, and a clear violation of the duty owed by the pledgee to the pledgee. Brass v. Worth, 40 Barb. 648; Rankin v. McCullough, 12 Barb. 103.

And a sale of stock held in pledge at the board of brokers upon default in payment of the principal debt is not valid in the absence of an express stipulation authorizing it. Castello v. City Bank, 1 N. Y. Legal Obs. 25.

And authority to a pledgee of stock to sell it at the board of brokers for the payment of the debt secured if it was not paid when due does not authorize the pledgee, even if he had retained the stock in his own hands, to put it up secretly; it should be sold openly to the highest bidder at the board of brokers after stating that it was the stock which had been pledged for the security of that particular debt, with authority to sell in that manner. Dykens v. Allen, 7 Hill, 497, 42 Am. Dec. 87. 43 L. R. A.

Where authority is given a pledgee of stock to sell without notice at public or private sale in case of default, however, a sale at the board of brokers is valid. Wicks v. Hatch, 6 Jones & S. 5, Affirmed 62 N. Y. 535.

And a sale of stock or bonds pledged as collateral security for nonpayment of the debt secured after proper demand and notice may lawfully be made in the city of New York at the merchants' exchange. Brown v. Ward, 3 Duer, 660.

It will be inferred from an allegation of due notice of intention to sell and of sale pursuant to notice, in an action by a broker against a customer whose stock had been sold for failure to maintain a margin, that the sale was made at the time specified in the notice at the gold board. Schepeler v. Elsner, 8 Daly, 11, Affirmed, 54 N. Y. 675.

As to sale by board of brokers, see also Maryland F. Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 242, 80 Am. Dec. 779; and Bryson v. Rayner, 25 Md. 424, 90 Am. Dec. 69, supra, II. c. 1.

A postponement of the exercise of the right of a pledgee to sell the thing pledged upon failure to pay the original indebtedness cannot be complained of by the pledgee, as it merely enlarges his opportunity to redeem and thereby prevent any sacrifice that would result from a forced sale of the pledge. Robinson v. Hurley, 11 Iowa, 410, 79 Am. Dec. 497.

And the time when bonds pledged as security for the payment of a note, which is in turn pledged as security for the payment of acceptances, may be sold for nonpayment, is determined by the maturity of the note, and not of the acceptances. Chouteau v. Allen, 70 Mo. 290.

And the sale of stock hypothecated to secure a three months' note under which the pledgee agreed to hold three months, at the end of the three months, is not a wrongful act, though the three days of grace allowed on the note had not expired. Rankin v. McCullough, 12 Barb. 103.

But a transfer by a pledgee of a bond and mortgage held as collateral security for a sum sufficient to pay the principal debt but grossly inadequate to the value of the bond and mortgage, which were thus canceled, constitutes a conversion of such bond and mortgage for which the pledgee is liable in an action of trover. Campbell v. Parker, 9 Bosw. 322.

And while stock transferred as collateral security with power to sell at public or private sale may, on default of payment of the debt, be sold by the pledgee after demand of payment and notice of the time and place of sale, the sale must be conducted in good faith, and if it is made in an unusual mode, or on short notice, or without notice, it will be declared invalid, and the pledgee will be held liable for the damages caused. Bates v. Wiles, 1 Handy (Ohio) 532.

And where the officers of a bank are empowered to sell collateral security upon the failure of the maker of a note to comply with its terms, and the option is given by which they can dispose of the stock held as security at public or private sale, and they choose to make the sale public, they must conform to the rules governing public sales so far as publicity is concerned, and the power of sale must be exercised with a view to the interests of the pledgee as well as the pledgee, and the sale should not be forced for barely sufficient money to secure the payment of the debt, when the securities are known to be much more valuable. Foot v. Utah Commercial & Sav. Bank, 17 Utah, 283.

So, a commission merchant receiving goods to sell at a certain limited price, who makes an advance upon them and is expressly authorized to sell and thereby to reimburse himself, no limit being placed upon the time when the sale is to be made, must wait a reasonable time if the sale could not be made for the price limited, but after a reasonable time has elapsed, and a demand has been made upon the consignor to repay the money advanced, which he refuses to do, he may sell them at a fair market price though below the limit. Parker v. Brancker, 22 Pick. 40.

But sales of stock below the market price, by brokers holding the same in pledge when duly authorized, does not render them liable for the difference between the selling price and the market price, unless made with an intent to injure the principal beyond the mere regulation of the amount due the brokers. Durant v. Elstein, 35 How. Pr. 231.

And brokers who are mere pawnees are not bound in disposing of a pawn to use even the same diligence as an agent to obtain the best price, and will not be held liable except for extraordinary negligence, which must be proved and not presumed. Ibid.

And a pledgee of property hypothecated to secure a debt, having a right to sell it on notice or demand, no time having been fixed for payment, may do so at public auction, and is under no legal obligation to wait until a depressed money market is better in order to obtain a higher market price; therefore, as the parties will be presumed to have taken the risk of fluctuations when the pledge was made. King v. Texas Bkg. & Ins. Co. 58 Tex. 669.

So, one who places money in the hands of a broker as a margin for the purchase of pork and lard on the board of trade, and who is notified that his margin has become exhausted and fails to produce the necessary margin, and after such failure and within a reasonable time according to the customs and usages of the board of trade the stock is sold by the broker, cannot recover the margins thus deposited, if the sale was regular according to the agreement, or in the absence of an agreement to the rules of the board of trade. Denton v. Jackson, 106 Ill. 433.

And an owner of stock which he exchanges for other stock pledged to secure a debt past due cannot complain of want of proper care on the part of the pledgee in protecting his interests as pledgee in making a sale thereof and that the sale was made for less than the real value, where in the preceding month other shares of the same stock had been sold by the pledgee at the same price, and the pledgee had said that the price was satisfactory, and there was nothing to show that the parties had learned any facts showing a change in the value of the stock or in the situation of the property. Smith v. Lee, 84 Fed. Rep. 557.

And a sale of promissory notes and a draft held in pledge as collateral security for reimbursement is not rendered invalid by the fact that it was made in Providence instead of New York, where the contract of hypothecation purported to be a Rhode Island contract, and it does not appear that any objection was ever made to the place of sale. Potter v. Thompson, 10 R. I. 1.

But where the maker of a promissory note pledges a chattel to a surety thereon, and the surety transfers it to the payee for the purpose of discharging the debt, the transfer does not change the status of the property, and the pledgee has the right to redeem even after maturity. Morgan v. Dod, 3 Colo. 551.

V. Purchase by pledgee.

The doctrine of the principal case on this subject seems to be general, if not universal. 43 L. R. A.

Thus, while a sale by the pledgee of the thing pledged to himself is illegal and ineffectual to pass title, it does not break up the bailment except at the election of the pledgee. The title to the property remains as before, and where the property remains in the possession of the pledgee the transaction does not work a conversion, but the bailment continues as if nothing had been done. Maryland F. Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 242, 89 Am. Dec. 779; Baltimore Marine Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 269; Bryan v. Baldwin, 52 N. Y. 232, 7 Lans. 174. And see Greer v. Lafayette County Bank, 128 Mo. 559, supra, III. b; Earle v. Grant, 14 R. I. 228, infra, VII.

And authority given to a pledgee to sell the pledge to any person, persons, or corporation does not authorize him to become himself the purchaser, and in case he does so the pledgee may redeem by paying the debt with interest notwithstanding the sale; authority to the pledgee to become the purchaser must be given in very plain terms. Hamilton v. Schaack, 16 N. Y. Week. Dig. 423.

A purchase by a pledgee of the thing pledged is voidable but not void; the pledgee has the option to affirm or to repudiate the sale. If he affirms the sale his action validates it and passes the title to the collateral to the pledgee, and entitles the pledgee to the amount bid at the sale, but to no more, and if he repudiates it, the sale is void, and the pledgee has the collaterals under the original pledge with the same rights and subject to the same liabilities as if no sale had been attempted, and cannot be charged with conversion until he wrongfully parts with the possession of and control over them. First Nat. Bank v. Ruah, 56 U. S. App. 556, 85 Fed. Rep. 539, 29 C. C. A. 333.

So, a pledgee who takes notes secured by a mortgage as collateral security for a debt represented by the mortgage is not liable as for a conversion of the pledge for procuring a judgment of foreclosure of the assigned mortgage in his own name; he is merely liable to account for the proceeds when collected and for the payment to the debtor of any surplus remaining after the application of the proceeds of sale under his own mortgage and the payment of the balance from the proceeds of the assigned mortgage. McArthur v. Magee, 114 Cal. 126.

And a sale of stock pledged by a pledgee without notice to the pledgee, in which the original certificates were surrendered and new certificates issued in the name of the purchaser, which were indorsed in blank by him and remained in the possession of the pledgee, the purchaser never paying anything or claiming them, and his name having been used as a convenience in order to effect a sale, the pledgee being the real purchaser, is not a conversion of the stock where it was all the time within the power of the pledgee to return the stock to the pledgee upon payment of the indebtedness secured up to the time when the pledgee subsequently made a valid sale thereof upon notice to the pledgee. Terry v. Birmingham Nat. Bank, 98 Ala. 599.

And an instruction in an action on a promissory note to secure which stock had been pledged, which pledge had been sold and purchased by the pledgee, that the defendant was entitled to set off the full value of the stock at the time of the sale without regard to the amount realized from the sale, in effect declares that because the stock was sold to the pledgee instead of a third person and might for that reason be avoided it was ipso facto a conversion, although it might have been made in good faith and is therefore erroneous, the rights of the pledgee being to disavow the sale and reclaim his stock upon paying his note. Killian v. Hoffman, 6 Ill. App. 200.

So, a pledgee of stocks cannot recover in trover against a purchaser thereof from the pledgee where the pledgee had first sold them and himself become the purchaser, if he sold them publicly at the board of brokers in parcels to different persons fairly and in the usual way, though a recovery might be had in an action ex contractu for any excess that might remain in the hands of defendant arising from the sale of the stock, or dividends received therefrom. Maryland F. Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 242, 69 Am. Dec. 770.

The rule has been laid down, however, that a pledgee to whom stock was conveyed as collateral security for a debt which was afterwards paid, who sells the stock at auction and bids it in, is liable in trover for the value of the stock at the time of the alleged sale, and for dividends received by him thereon and interest, deducting therefrom the amount of assessments paid and expenses of sale. Freeman v. Harwood, 49 Me. 195.

And a sale by a bank of stocks pledged to it by a debtor as collateral security for existing and future liability to its own officers without notice or judicial sale is a violation of its duties to the pledgee, and an illegal mode of dealing with the collateral held in trust, which will render it liable for the value of the securities which may be offset against its claim. Sitgreaves v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 49 Pa. 359.

So, it has been held that where a pledgee takes a conveyance of securities pledged to him without a judicial sale he is properly held for the value of the property received by him. He may be held as trustee for the reason that he had taken title to property without the owner's consent and in violation of his rights, or he may be treated as wrongfully converting the same, and held for its value. Kelly v. Matlock, 85 Cal. 122.

No duty devolves upon a special partner in a firm which took a pledge of stocks as collateral security in reference to the bailment, and a purchase by him individually of the stock pledged at a sale thereof terminates the bailment, and will not be deemed a purchase by the firm. Lewis v. Graham, 4 Abb. Pr. 110.

VI. Tender of payment to render conversion actionable.

The general rule is that no tender of the debt due by the pledgee is necessary as a preliminary to an action by him against the pledgee for the conversion of the pledge by an unauthorized sale thereof made before the debt was due, as by making such sale the pledgee disabled himself from returning the property. Kilpatrick v. Dean, 19 N. Y. S. R. 837; Read v. Lambert, 19 Abb. Pr. N. S. 428; Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cal. Cas. 200; Stearns v. Marsh, 4 Denio, 227, 47 Am. Dec. 248; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Davies, 38 Hun, 477; Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392; Sheridan v. Pressa, 18 Misc. 180; Work v. Bennett, 70 Pa. 484; Walley v. Deseret Nat. Bank, 14 Utah, 305.

Thus, a wife whose watch is pledged by her husband under an authority to raise money thereon, which is sold by the pledgee without notice, may recover therefor without paying or offering to pay the money borrowed. Van Arsdaile v. Joiner, 44 Ga. 178.

And the defense of a conversion of stock pledged by a pledgee by a sale thereof without notice in an action brought by the pledgee upon the principal debt may be made without demanding restitution of the collateral, or tendering payment of the debt secured thereby. Waring v. Gaskill, 95 Ga. 731.

And a pledgee who is sued upon the principal debt need not tender payment, but he can maintain a counterclaim for damages for a sale of his collaterals to a third person who had transferred them beyond the control of the pledgee without notice to the latter that he holds them as the agent of the pledgee who is the real purchaser. First Nat. Bank v. Rush, 56 U. S. App. 556, 85 Fed. Rep. 539, 29 C. C. A. 333, 36 U. S. App. 248, 71 Fed. Rep. 102, 17 C. C. A. 627.

Nor is a tender of a debt secured by a pledgee necessary to the maintenance of an action to redeem where the pledgee had disposed of the property pledged by private sale without notice, though the purchaser had knowledge of the facts. Lockett v. Townsend, 3 Tex. 119, 49 Am. Dec. 723.

So, a complaint in an action against stock brokers for selling a customer's stock purchased by him payable on time, at his option, in violation of his instructions, need not allege a demand upon defendant and an exercise of the plaintiff's option, or a tender of the amount due on the purchase of the stock. Clarke v. Meigs, 22 How. Pr. 340.

And where a pledgee disposes of things pledged separate from the debt, and thereby incapacitates himself from returning the pledge on demand, the pledgee may sustain an action to recover therefor without a tender of the amount advanced. Felt v. Heye, 23 How. Pr. 359.

And where a firm of brokers which purchased stock for a customer becomes insolvent and has no stock which it can deliver, the customer is at liberty to claim the market value of the stock by way of credit on account, without making a demand for the stock and tendering payment of the amount due, as in such case a demand would be an idle ceremony. Chamberlain v. Greenleaf, 4 Abb. N. C. 178.

So, the fact that stock brokers, who had purchased stock for a customer on a margin and held it as security, converted a part of it by pledging it for their own debt, which was afterwards sold by the pledgee, will not prevent a recovery by them from the customer of the purchase price of the stock so pledged, though the stock was never tendered to him or the amount due thereon demanded, as the pledge and sale of the stock did not constitute a failure to perform a condition precedent, but was a breach of a condition subsequent to the purchase, so that they were entitled to credit for it, but were liable for damages sustained by the customer by reason of the subsequent conversion. Capron v. Thompson, 86 N. Y. 418.

And a complaint in an action for an advance or loan is sufficient where it simply states that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for a designated amount of money loaned or advanced; and where the plaintiff goes further, and states that an advance of money was made, and that stock was received as collateral, and that it was sold and produced a certain sum, which being deducted from the advance left a balance, which with the accrued interest amounted to the sum stated, the complaint is not demurrable because it was not also alleged that demand for the advance and notice of the contemplated sale of securities was made, as such matter is matter of defense. Wallace v. Berdell, 24 Hun, 379.

The right to the possession of property pledged follows from the extinguishment of the debt secured or a sufficient tender of payment of such debt, however, and a tender of what is due is essential to the establishment of the right of the pledgee to recover for a conversion of the thing pledged; and if no tender is made by the pledgeor he cannot maintain an action as for conversion where after the debt was due and unpaid the pledgee disposed of it without notice. Reardon v. Patterson, 19 Mont. 231.

And a sale of bonds held as collateral security by a pledgee to reimburse himself is not invalid because made after the pledgeor had offered to redeem, where the offer was not accompanied by a tender of the bonds themselves or the money to pay for them and the money to pay for their depreciation. Potter v. Thompson, 10 R. I. 1.

And one who gave canal scrip to a creditor as collateral security for his note, authorizing the creditor to sell the security and apply the avails in payment if the note was not paid at maturity, which scrip was sold and assigned by the creditor to another, who afterwards sold the same at auction after maturity and nonpayment of the note, cannot recover against the last holder of the scrip as for a tort or illegal conversion, where he simply offered to pay him the amount due without making any tender thereof. Lewis v. Mott, 36 N. Y. 395.

So, a sale by one who loaned a sum of money on a promissory note of the borrower payable on demand and on the security of scrip certificates for shares of stock after the borrower became bankrupt, without demand or notice to repay the debt, does not reveal the immediate right to the possession of the shares in the assignee of the borrower so as to enable him to maintain trover, either for the whole value of the shares or for nominal damages, without making any payment or tender of the amount of the debt. Halliday v. Holgate, L. R. 3 Exch. 299, 37 L. J. Exch. N. S. 174, 18 L. T. N. S. 656, 17 Week. Rep. 18.

And a tender made by a pledgeor after the satisfaction of the debt secured by the pledge by a sale thereof properly made is too late to be available in an action of trover brought for its conversion. Loomis v. Stave, 72 Ill. 623.

So, a pledgeor of bonds which have been sold by the pledgee cannot, after waiting some time after the sale and the bonds have risen in value, maintain an action in equity to recover their value, where he had never made any tender for the purpose of redeeming them or any effort to reclaim them. Lacombe v. Forstall, 123 U. S. 562, 31 L. ed. 255.

And a demand by a pledgeor for a return of stock pledged or for its present value will be deemed a stale demand, and to have been barred by unreasonable delay in its assertion, where it was made more than thirteen years after the original deposit, and at one time during the period the stock was pledged it was worth but very little, and at the time of its sale by the pledgee it was not above par, and when the bill was filed it had rapidly increased in value and during the progress of the cause reached eight times its par value and nearly forty times the lowest rate to which it had once fallen. Gilmer v. Morris, 80 Ala. 78, 60 Am. Rep. 85.

But in Gilmer v. Morris, 35 Fed. Rep. 682, which was a subsequent action brought upon substantially the same facts, it was held that where stock is pledged to secure a present indebtedness and future advance, the statute of limitations will not begin to run until notice is given that sale will be made in default of payment.

So, while no tender and demand are necessary to the maintenance of an action for the conversion of bonds purchased and carried by a broker for a customer and transferred by him to a stranger for a larger amount than was due from the customer, a tender should be made where he had merely passed the bonds over to the pledgee for an amount not greater than that 43 L. R. A.

which the customer owed him thereon. Rankin v. McCullough, 12 Barb. 103.

And an owner of railroad bonds, who transfers them to stock brokers to be held as margins in stock transactions, which stock brokers deposit them with a bank as security, upon the faith of which the bank makes advances, after which the brokers fail, cannot recover of the bank where no offer to repay the advance or redeem the bonds was made and the bank afterwards sold them, realizing less than the amount of the advance. Thompson v. St. Nicholas Nat. Bank, 113 N. Y. 325.

And a pledgeor of bank stock cannot recover of the bank as for a conversion of the stock where the pledgee procured a sale of the stock without notice, and itself purchased at the sale and procured the transfer of the stock to itself on the books of the corporation, on the ground that the corporation participated in converting the stock by transferring it on its books to the pledgee, where the pledgeor still owes the pledgee the original indebtedness. First Nat. Bank v. Mings, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 302.

To put the pledgee of a stock note in default, and to subject him to the consequences of a conversion thereof by an unlawful sale, the pledgeor is bound to pay or offer to pay his note on the day it becomes due, though that would not be necessary in case of an action to redeem. Butts v. Burnett, 6 Abb. Pr. N. Y. 302.

And a request by a debtor to his creditor to present the note representing the principal indebtedness for payment is not such an offer of payment as will sustain an action for a conversion by the creditor of securities held by him by a sale thereof. Ibid.

VII. Ratification of sale and waiver of conversion.

The question whether a pledgeor has ratified a sale or waived a conversion is one of fact depending generally upon all the facts of each particular case, and particularly upon the question whether he had knowledge of the facts at the time of the acts alleged to constitute a ratification or waiver.

Thus, where property pledged is sold by the pledgee at private sale, and the pledgeor knowingly accepts the proceeds of such sale, he cannot complain of it as a conversion of the pledge. Hamilton v. State Bank, 22 Iowa, 306.

And a sale of a pledge by a pledgee cannot be avoided on the ground that no demand was made on the pledgeor for payment, and that the pledgee did not give the pledgeor any notice of the time and place of sale, and that the sale was not at a public auction, where the pledgeor attended the sale and did not object to it, but made a bid, and after the sale the pledgeor with the pledgee and purchaser joined in drinking in celebration of the sale, and the sale was held in a room which, though generally open only to members of the board of trade, was open to the public at the time of the sale. Earle v. Grant, 14 R. I. 228.

And a pledgeor whose property was pledged with power of sale to the pledgee, who exchanges the same for other property, who brings an action for the recovery of the property taken by the exchange, thereby sufficiently ratifies the exchange; but if he brings suit to recover the original property it amounts to a repudiation thereof. Strong v. Adams, 80 Vt. 221, 73 Am. Dec. 805.

So, one who pledges a diamond pin to secure the payment of a debt, and afterwards calls upon the pledgee to redeem it, and tenders the money due, which is refused on account of a difference of opinion as to the amount, and who then leaves the pledge in the pledgee's possession, taking no immediate steps to recover it, when it is afterwards disposed of by the pledgee, abandons his right thereto based upon the tender, and authorizes others to regard the pledge as still subsisting, and cannot thereafter recover it of the person to whom it is subsequently pledged, without tendering the amount for which the pledge was given and demanding its return. Bradley v. Parks, 83 Ill. 169.

And a debtor pledging a bond as collateral security for his indebtedness, which bond is collected by the pledgee instead of being kept for return upon payment of the debt, who brings an action for money had and received, thereby waives the tort and ratifies the act of the pledgee in collecting the bond. Hancock v. Franklin Ins. Co. 114 Mass. 156.

And the maker of a promissory note who pledged a policy of life insurance as collateral security for its payment, with power to sell the same at public or private sale, who, upon being pressed for payment, wrote to the payee fifteen months after the maturity of the note that he would pay him a certain sum for the policy, which the payee refused to take and demanded a larger sum, stating that unless it was paid he would sell it, to which the maker made no reply, and seven months later the payee sold the policy and notified the maker, who made no objection or complaint for over seven years, will be deemed to have waived further notice. Downer v. Whittier, 144 Mass. 448.

Where a pledgee of scrip sells more than is necessary to pay the indebtedness due, however, the pledgor does not forfeit his right to recover damages therefor by accepting the excess price of scrip so sold. Fitzgerald v. Blocher, 32 Ark. 742, 29 Am. Rep. 3.

But the right to bring an action for trover for the unlawful sale of a pledge will be deemed to have been waived, where after the sale the pledgor accepted from the pledgee the estimated difference between the real value of his stock pledged and what it sold for, and afterwards demanded his stock note on the theory that it had been paid by the sale of his stock, and neglected to bring action until six years after the sale. McDowell v. Chicago Steel Works, 124 Ill. 491, 22 Ill. App. 405.

And a pledgor of securities as collateral to a stock note, who after knowledge of a sale thereof by the pledgee presents to him a statement showing the balance due him, accompanying it with an offer to receive it in satisfaction, waives the tort, and cannot maintain an action for the conversion. Butts v. Burnett, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 302.

And an owner of securities pledged with power of sale is not entitled to an accounting by the pledgees and purchasers thereof, or to a declaration of trust with respect to it on the ground that the stock was sold for less than its true value, where in the following month sales were made of shares of the same stock, at the same figure, which the pledgor said were satisfactory, and there is nothing to show that he had learned any facts showing a change in the value of the stock, or in the situation, which should have given him a different opinion. Smith v. Lee, 84 Fed. Rep. 557.

So, one who deposits securities with a bank with power of sale, who is informed of the purpose of the bank to sell them and of the proposition of three directors of the bank to purchase them, must give expression in some form to his disapproval, and if he makes no objection and permits the sale to take place without objecting, he cannot maintain an action 43 L. R. A.

in equity against the bank for the redemption of the securities and to compel it to retransfer them to him. Hayward v. Elliot Nat. Bank, 98 U. S. 611, 24 L. ed. 855.

And a pledgor of mining stocks who knew in advance of a contemplated sale thereof and of the time and place, and made no objection, and was presented with an account after the sale, in which he was credited with the amount received at the sale, and knowing all the facts admitted the correctness of the account, and even approved of the sale, and afterwards repeatedly promised to pay the balance, and never objected to the correctness of the account or to the sale, or on account of want of notice, or for any other reason, will be held to have ratified it, and to have estopped himself from objecting that sufficient notice of the time and place of sale was not given. Child v. Hugg, 41 Cal. 519.

And the maker of a note who pledged stock as collateral security therefor with power to sell the same at public or private sale, who after maturity of the note received letters from the payee stating that he must sell the stock unless something is paid, and afterwards received notice that he would sell the stock on a certain day, which was seven days later, to which he makes no reply, on which day the stock was sold and the proceeds applied in part payment of the note, will be deemed to have waived any further notice where the old certificate was sent to the maker, who was the treasurer of the corporation issuing the stock, which he transferred on the books of the corporation and issued a new certificate, and afterwards, when the corporation sold out to another company of which he was also treasurer, he issued new stock to the purchaser in exchange for the old, without at any time making any objections to the sale or to the notice given him. Downer v. Whittier, 144 Mass. 448.

But a wrongful sale of stocks carried by a broker for a customer without a demand for more margin is not assented to or ratified by the payment by the customer of an account showing the sale and the balance due, which was demanded, where the customer demurred, but made the payment upon the threat of the broker to sell other securities belonging to her which she needed for use. Stenton v. Jerome, 54 N. Y. 480.

And the failure of a customer to dissent from a sale made by stock brokers carrying stocks for him upon a margin, upon learning of it, is not a ratification and confirmation of their action, where he did not know at the time that the sale had been made privately at the board of brokers instead of at public auction. Brass v. Worth, 40 Barb. 648.

A principal whose stock is sold by a broker, which sale is reported to him and he expresses no dissatisfaction with it, however, is not entitled to damages on account thereof. Gallagher v. Jones, 129 U. S. 193, 32 L. ed. 658.

An owner of stocks which were sold by his broker for failure to make good his margin, desiring to claim that the sale was void because prematurely made, should have dissented at once and notified his brokers of such dissent, and where he received information of the sale in May, and remained silent until September, and demanded in the meantime an account of sales, which was sent him with a check for the balance due which he indorsed and collected, he will be held to have ratified the sale. Hanks v. Drake, 49 Barb. 186.

And where stocks held by a broker on a margin are sold by the broker and an account rendered to the customer, his failure to object to the sale within a reasonable time after notice amounts to an implied ratification, and the account will be treated as an account stated. Vanhorn v. Glibough (Pa.) 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 171.

And one whose stock was sold by his broker, and who repudiated and disavowed the sale, and the broker acceded to such disavowal and agreed that he would consider the sale as his own, and that it was to be subsequently treated as a nullity, thereby waived his right to recover against the broker as for a conversion of the stock at that sale, and he cannot recover therefor where the stock is subsequently sold by the broker on due notice for failure to maintain the margin. Stewart v. Drake, 46 N. Y. 449.

But a complaint in an action by a broker against a customer for a balance due, alleging that the plaintiff had sold stock carried by him and applied the proceeds in payment of the original indebtedness as security for the payment of which it was held in pledge, does not preclude the plaintiff from showing that he had not sold and disposed of the stock, where at the trial he was permitted to prove what in fact had been done without objection, as in such case the court will determine the case from the facts proved irrespective of the allegations of the pleadings. Bryan v. Baldwin, 52 N. Y. 232.

Whether a customer whose stock had been sold out by a broker carrying it for failure to maintain the margin, making certain extra charges for carrying the stock, agreed to repay such extra charges is a question for the jury in an action of assumpsit by the customer against the broker, where there was evidence that he assented to the sale of his stock after being made acquainted with the charges, for the reason that they were rapidly eating up the margins, and afterwards received the balance due without objection. Wagner v. Peterson, 93 Pa. 238.

And where a private sale is made of stock pledged, and the pledgee becomes the purchaser, and the evidence leaves in doubt the time when the pledgeor was informed of the fact, the question of his ratification of such sale by a subsequent settlement with the pledgee should be submitted to the jury to be determined from the conduct of the pledgeor and the entire evidence in the case. Sharpe v. National Bank, 87 Ala. 644.

So, where, after a private sale of a pledge is made without notice to the pledgeor, he is informed that his stock was sold at par, and receives a statement of his account showing a credit of the proceeds of the sale, and a few days afterwards, without objection or further inquiry, he settles with the pledgee by giving his note for the unsatisfied balance, such settlement is not a waiver of the right to object to the private sale and the purchase by the pledgee. If made in ignorance of the fact that the pledgee was the purchaser, but would be so if, after being informed of the facts, he retained the benefits of the sale for some time without objection brought home to the pledgee. Ibid.

And a sale by a pledgee of property pledged in which he himself becomes the purchaser cannot be avoided and set aside in equity, where the pledgeor, after full knowledge of all that had been done, acquiesced and remained silent for more than eleven years, during which time there had been great changes in the value of the property, there having been a rise in value at the time of the application. Marsh v. Whitmore, 1 Haskell, 391, 21 Wall. 178, 22 L. ed. 482.

And a pledgeor whose stock pledged as collateral security had been sold, and purchased at such sale by the pledgee, who remained silent 43 L. R. A.

for nearly two months after he was informed of the facts, and until the stocks had risen to a very high price, will be deemed, as matter of law, to have ratified such sale. Hill v. Finigan, 77 Cal. 267.

Merely leaving a pledge in the hands of a pledgee with no offer to redeem when no attempt by the creditor for the payment was made, however, is not of itself enough to justify submitting the question of its abandonment to the jury on the question whether or not a sale thereof amounted to a conversion. Reynolds v. Cridge, 181 Pa. 189.

But while mere silence irrespective of lapse of time might not amount to an election or ratification on the part of the pledgeor, whose stock pledged as collateral security had been sold by the pledgee to himself, where he commenced to treat with the pledgee for the purchase of a portion of the property with knowledge of his rights it would be sufficient. Hill v. Finigan, 77 Cal. 267.

And an instruction in an action for the conversion of a pledge by a sale thereof, that if a pledgeor upon being informed of the fact that the pledgee had purchased the property at such sale did not within a reasonable time object to such purchase it would be deemed to have been ratified, and be valid, is not subject to the objection that ratification is a fact which the jury should not be told they could infer from other facts, or that ratification implies affirmative action, as the substance of it is that if the jury believe that there was unreasonable delay they must find a ratification; though it might have been better to have charged that the pledgeor had a right of election to treat the sale as invalid, and that he would lose this right by failing to exercise it within a reasonable time. Ibid.

And an instruction in an action by the pledgeor against the pledgee for the conversion of stock pledged by a sale thereof, that if the defendant caused the property pledged to be offered for sale at public auction but without notice, and if at the sale the property was bid in by him for a fair market price, and higher prices were not obtainable at the time, and if the plaintiff upon being informed of such sale made no objection thereto, but commenced to treat with the defendant for the purchase of a portion of the property pledged, the jury should find that the sale was so ratified, is not subject to the objection that it is an instruction as to what inferences of fact should be drawn by the jury, as all the jury could have understood from it was that if the plaintiff did certain things those things amounted to a sufficient election to treat the sale as valid, and having once made his election he was bound by it. Ibid.

So, the omission to enumerate the pledgeor's knowledge of the law as one of the elements of the ratification of the sale of his securities by his pledgee to himself, in an instruction as to what would constitute a ratification of the sale, is not error whether such knowledge is essential to ratification or not, where there is nothing in the record to show that the pledgeor did not know the law, as the presumption is that he did know it. Ibid.

One for whom a broker purchased stock, who admits that he was not acting in good faith and never intended to pay for it, is estopped from complaining of want of notice of sale thereof, or any other formality in connection with it. Vanhorn v. Glibough (Pa.) 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 171.

And a pledgeor of stock cannot claim, in an action against the pledgee, that by depositing the stock in escrow under an agreement to convey it upon the exercise of an option, that he converted the stock and so lost his lien as pledgee, where by his pleading he waived the tort of the pledgee if tort there was, and elected to treat the contract with the purchaser as one which the pledgee had authority to make. Bixby v. Crafts (Cal.) 53 Pac. 404.

So, an owner of securities, who places them in the possession of an agent, which agent wrongfully pledges them to a third party, who converts them by an unlawful sale thereof, may, on ratifying the pledge made by the agent, maintain an action for their conversion against the pledgee. Smith v. Savin, 69 Hun, 311.

And where stocks are bought for a customer by a firm of brokers which afterwards become insolvent, which can be identified in the hands of any pledgee of the firm who has sold it, such customer may elect to ratify such sale if he has done nothing inconsistent with his right to make such election, and claim the price at which it was sold. Chamberlain v. Greenleaf, 4 Abb. N. C. 178.

The provision of California Civil Code, § 306, forbidding a pledgee to sell any evidence of debt pledged to him, and limiting his right to collect the same when due, is designed for the benefit of the pledgeor, and may be waived by him. McArthur v. Magee, 114 Cal. 126.

VIII. Remedies.

a. By direct action.

Where a pledgee violates the terms of his pledge, and converts the thing pledged by a sale thereof, the pledgeor has an immediate right to possession and immediate right of action, and may maintain trover or a special action on the case. Smith v. Savin, 69 Hun, 311, 30 Abb. N. C. 192; Donnell v. Wyckoff, 49 N. J. L. 48.

A pledgeor whose property pledged has been wrongfully disposed of by a pledgee has an election of remedies for such conversion, and may maintain either trover or assumpsit. Stearns v. Marsh, 4 Denio, 227, 47 Am. Dec. 248.

So, where a cashier of a bank holds stock in trust for another, and uses it with other securities as collateral in obtaining a loan from a bank, without its present knowledge or approval, and the bank afterwards accepts such note and security, and sells the collateral to itself to pay the note, after it has received notice of the interest of the cestui que trust therein, when the security left by the cashier outside of the trust fund is more than doubly sufficient to pay the loan if sold with proper care and diligence, the cestui que trust may by proper proceeding have the sale of his stock set aside and a decree entered transferring the stock to his own use. Footo v. Utah Commercial & Sav. Bank, 17 Utah, 283.

And where stock is purchased by brokers for a customer, and pledged by them, after which they fail, which can be identified in the hands of the pledgee who has sold it, the customer may reach the proceeds of the stock thus identified when they come into the receiver's hands. Chamberlain v. Greenleaf, 4 Abb. N. C. 178.

So, a pledgee who sells collaterals in his hands, though publicly, and purchases them himself, holds them after the sale as he did previously, as a mere security, and the pledgeor may redeem or require him to account for their market value. Register v. Sellers, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 490, 44 Phila. Leg. Int. 502.

And a holder of collateral securities, who sells them on default of payment of the principal debt, and purchases at his own sale, holds them subject to the original trust, though the sale is entirely regular, and cannot sue upon them after his debt is paid; and the pledgeor 43 L. R. A.

may maintain an action for an accounting or for the return of the securities. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. v. Shields, 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 257.

And a pledgee of stock who without special authority causes the same to be offered for sale at the board of brokers and becomes the purchaser thereof, and continues to hold it, will be regarded as still maintaining the character of bailee, and holding the pledge to secure the payment of the loan with interest, and will be required to account for all dividends on the stock received by him in the meantime. Bryson v. Rayner, 25 Md. 424, 90 Am. Dec. 69.

And where a debtor secures his promissory note payable on demand at a bank by a transfer of shares of stock, and the bank makes other advances and receives other notes from him, and demand is made for the payment of the note but no notice of intention to sell the security is given, three days after which the debtor assigns to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, and subsequently the bank sells the stock held as security, the trustee and the debtor waiving notice and consenting to the sale, and the proceeds are more than sufficient to pay the note, the trustee can recover such surplus in an action against the bank. Brown v. New Bedford Inst. for Sav. 137 Mass. 262.

Unliquidated damages for the unauthorized sale of pledged stocks or securities, however, can form no part of an account for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to a court of equity. Durant v. Elstein, 35 How. Pr. 281.

And one whose securities have been wrongfully disposed of by a pledgee has an adequate remedy at law in an independent action of trover or assumpsit, and a bill in equity seeking an application of his damages to the debt secured will not be sustained while an action is pending by the creditor for the recovery of the debt. Bulkeley v. Welch, 31 Conn. 339.

And a bill in equity to redeem stock, pledged to a bank as security for the payment of a note with absolute power to sell, which was transferred by written assignment to another, who made a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, and the assignee notified the bank that he would pay the note at maturity, and claimed the stock, but the bank afterwards sold it and applied the proceeds to the payment, first of that note, and afterwards of other notes of the pledgeor, will not lie at the suit of the assignee, as he has a full, adequate, and convenient remedy at law. Roland v. Lancaster County Nat. Bank, 135 Pa. 598.

A court of equity, however, in which an action has been commenced for the redemption of the pledge, where it appears that no good ground therefor existed and that nothing remained but an action for tort in improperly disposing of the pledge, for which an ample remedy exists at law, may order the cause to be tried by a jury at the circuit. Genet v. Howland, 45 Barb. 560.

And where a pledgee purchased stock pledged at a sale thereof, made because the debtor refused to pay another debt to another person not included in the pledge, and sold it after a bill was filed to compel a reconveyance, a court of equity has jurisdiction to enter a decree for damages against the pledgee for the conversion of the stock. Blood v. Erie Dime Sav. & L. Co. 164 Pa. 95.

But an equitable action for an accounting by a debtor against his creditor with whom he had deposited collateral security which collaterals had been sold, cannot be converted into an action at law for the recovery of damages, and judgment given therein as in an action for tort. Lewis v. Varnum, 12 Abb. Pr. 308.

Bonds of a city delivered to contractors making improvements upon which they borrowed money with which to prosecute the work, giving them as collateral security, the lender to be repaid the money advanced with interest and to have one third of the profits realized, no time for repayment or for sale of the collaterals being fixed, however, are so far in the nature of a trust fund as to give a court of chancery jurisdiction on the bill of one of the contractors for an accounting and to convert the securities and distribute the fund. Stokes v. Frazier, 72 Ill. 428.

So, the fact that a pledgee of stock borrowed money with which it was purchased from the pledgee does not affect his right to a reconveyance from the pledgee of the stock pledged, or, in case of a disposition of it by him, of an equal amount of stock of the same kind and value, where he had given his note for money borrowed, and was personally bound for its payment. Krouse v. Woodward, 110 Cal. 638.

And one who purchased stock to secure the payment of his note, which stock was disposed of by the pledgee who owned other stock in the same company and of the same value, is entitled to an order on the ground that he had no adequate remedy at law requiring the pledgee to convey to him an equal amount of his own stock in lieu thereof, where the stock had no market value and was purchased for investment with a view to an anticipated increase in value, and other shares could not be obtained because the holders would not sell. Ibid.

So, the rule has been laid down that a creditor who disposes of an article pledged as security for his debt loses his lien and the pledgee can recover its value without deducting the debt due. Cooke v. Haddon, 3 Fost. & F. 229.

And that an action by a pledgee against a pledgee for damages for an illegal sale or disposition of the thing pledged is one for conversion in which a counterclaim is not allowable. Smith v. Hall, 87 N. Y. 48.

But the prevailing rule would seem to be that a pledgee who has disposed of the property pledged may recover the debt of the pledgee when sued by him for conversion. Nabring v. Bank of Mobile, 58 Ala. 204; Stearns v. Marsh, 4 Denio, 227, 47 Am. Dec. 248; Smith v. Savin, 66 Hun, 311, 30 Abb. N. C. 192; Donnell v. Wyckoff, 49 N. J. L. 48.

Within this rule a conversion by a pledgee does not per se absolve the pledgee from the payment of the debt he has secured. Beardon v. Patterson, 19 Mont. 231.

And though a sale of a note held as collateral security by the pledgee amounts to a conversion, where the sum owing the pledgee by the pledgee is equal to the value of the paper, the pledgee would be entitled to nominal damages only. Cole v. Dalsiel, 13 Ill. App. 23.

The allowance of the unpaid debt in abatement of damages in an action against the pledgee for a wrongful sale of the pledge does not rest upon recoupment, strictly speaking, but it is made upon the principle of avoiding circuitry of action. Donnell v. Wyckoff, 49 N. J. L. 48.

And an action by a pledgee to recover damages of a pledgee for selling stock at private sale and without notice to the pledgee, is not an action for trover and conversion, but is one upon contract which will admit of a set-off. Seaman v. Reeve, 25 Barb. 454.

And a defense in an action by a pledgee against a pledgee for conversion of the property pledged, that the original debt was not paid and that it was equal to the value of the property pledged, need not be specially pleaded, but is fairly covered by the plea of nonassumpsit. 43 L. R. A.

Stearns v. Marsh, 4 Denio. 227, 47 Am. Dec. 248.

So, a pledgee to whom property is delivered as security for a debt under a contract reserving the right to the debtor to determine when and how it should be sold, but which he sells without the consent of the debtor, may recoup the amount of the debt for which the property was pledged, in an action against him for money had and received. Belden v. Perkins, 78 Ill. 449.

And where stock is pledged as collateral to an indebtedness with authority to the pledgee to sell in case of nonpayment, and the pledgee dies and the pledgee sells the property for a sum greater than the indebtedness, he cannot, as against the administrator, hold the balance to apply on another debt due him from the pledgee, under Tenn. Code. §§ 3219, 3242, and 3243, providing that the balance of accounts between the deceased and any creditor or debtor after allowing any just credits or set-off shall be taken as the true amount due to or from the estate, and in all suits by the executor or administrator of any deceased person, the insolvency of whose estate has been suggested, the defendant may plead a set-off of whatever amount may be due him from the testator or intestate at the time of his death. Peters v. Nashville Sav. Bank, 86 Tenn. 224.

And a debtor who secures his indebtedness by a pledge of a bond, and tenders the amount due shortly before the bond becomes due, has the right to treat the property pledged as discharged from the lien, and may maintain an action for the conversion of the bond in which the damages would be the value of the bond after deducting the amount of the pledgee's claim, but cannot set up that the pledgee had no right to collect the bond and apply it to his debt, and that the lien being discharged he had no right to set-off because the note was outlawed, and that therefore he was entitled to judgment for the whole amount received by the pledgee on the bond as so much money received to his use. Hancock v. Franklin Ins. Co. 114 Mass. 166.

So, an owner of stock pledged to a pledgee who becomes insolvent and makes an assignment is not entitled to payment in full out of the assigned estate on the ground that his stock was his property and its conversion was a breach of trust, which enabled him to follow the proceeds specifically, where it was converted prior to the assignment, though on the same day, not directly by the insolvent but by creditors with whom he had pledged it, and none of it came to the hands of the assignee. Jamison's Estate, 163 Pa. 143.

And a pledgee of stock should not be allowed a dividend on the entire value thereof without any deduction or set-off for the unpaid balance due by him to the pledgee, where such stock had been sold and the pledgee subsequently made an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Ibid.

And expenses incurred by a pledgee of railroad bonds in repairing damage done to the bonded railroad by a flood, which saves to them a large part if not the whole of their value, may be given in evidence in an action by a purchaser of the pledgee's interest against the pledgee for conversion by an unlawful disposition thereof, where previous to the expenditure the bonds were generally considered worthless and the amount realized upon them was based largely, if not entirely, upon such repairs, as the pledgee would be equitably bound to contribute his ratable proportion of the expenditure which produced such result. Reynolds v. Cridge, 131 Pa. 189.

A pledgee who is general creditor of the pledgeor, to whom securities are pledged as collateral security for a personal debt, however, cannot set off his general demand against the pledgeor in an action against him for a disposition of the securities amounting to a conversion. Lane v. Bailey, 47 Barb. 399.

And debts due a pledgee in independent transactions cannot be set off against the claim of a pledgeor for the conversion of the property pledged by a sale thereof before the debt was due, as such cause of action arose on contract, and formed no part of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim. Kilpatrick v. Dean, 19 N. Y. S. R. 837.

And trover will not lie against a depositary of township bonds as collateral security for the repayment of loans, to recover any surplus in his hands belonging to the depositor, where the bonds were sold pursuant to the terms of the agreement under which they were deposited. Loomis v. State, 72 Ill. 623.

An action for damages for a conversion of property pledged by a sale thereof is one in which a jury trial must be had unless waived by the parties in the manner prescribed by law. Lewis v. Varnum, 12 Abb. Pr. 308.

And a right of action by a pledgeor against a pledgee for the wrongful sale and conversion of property pledged does not die with the person upon death of the pledgeor as in other cases of personal tort, but survives to his representatives. Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cal. Cas. 200.

And a claim for damage arising from wrongful conversion of personal property by the sale or other disposition of a pledge is a chose in action which is assignable, and action may be properly brought in the name of the assignee. Genet v. Howland, 45 Barb. 560.

But an assignment of stock subject to the payment of the amount due thereon is insufficient to transfer a claim for damages for a prior conversion thereof by a sale thereof by a pledgee. Ibid.

And where stock is transferred as collateral security for a note, and upon failure to pay the note the pledgee purchases it himself, and the pledgeor afterwards agrees to transfer his interest to another, who demands the return of the stock and tenders the amount of the note, which is refused, the arrangement between the pledgeor and his transferee is only an agreement to sell, leaving the title to the stock in the pledgeor so as to entitle him to maintain trover against the pledgee for conversion. Seymour v. Ives, 46 Conn. 109.

So, the right of action for the conversion of mining stock held by a pledgeor in secret trust for another, which is sold by the pledgee, who takes it without notice of the secret trust, without previous demand and notice, is in the pledgeor, and not in the cestui que trust. Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99.

And the holder of a note, who also holds collateral securities for his payment, and who assigns the securities to a third person, is a necessary party to the debtor's action for an accounting as well as the assignee of the securities. Lewis v. Varnum, 12 Abb. Pr. 308.

And whether or not a stockholder whose shares have been duly transferred on the books of the company as security for a debt, may have such a legal title as will enable him to maintain trover against the pledgee for an unauthorized sale thereof, he may maintain a special action on the case, and a count in case may be added to the complaint in an action of trover by amendment. Nabring v. Bank of Mobile, 53 Ala. 204.

A pledgeor, who prosecutes an action against his pledgee for a conversion of bonds pledged to judgment elects thereby to treat the refusal of the pledgee to deliver the bonds to him upon the tender of the debt for which they were pledged as a sale thereof, and cannot thereafter successfully maintain an action against the receiver of the pledgee for a recovery of a part of such bonds. Deits v. Field, 10 App. Div. 425.

But the doctrine of election of remedies does not apply in an action by an owner of bonds and stocks which had been deposited with bankers as security for overdrafts, and pledged by the bankers for their own debt, and unlawfully sold by the pledgee, brought by the owner against the pledgee, where it was originally brought as an action to reach the proceeds of the sale, and changed by an amendment to the complaint to one of conversion, there having been but one action. Smith v. Savin, 69 Hun, 311, 30 Abb. N. C. 192.

And an instruction in an action by a pledgeor for the conversion of stock pledged by his pledgee that a conversion of personal property takes place whenever a person assumes the ownership or control of another's property in contravention of and against the rights of such other person and against his consent, is not subject to the objection that it ignores the pledgeor's right of election, where it appears that the pledgeor elected to treat the sale as invalid at the time mentioned in the instruction. Hill v. Kington, 77 Cal. 267.

And a recovery cannot be had in an action against brokers holding stock purchased by them as security for advances upon proof that they had actually made the purchase but afterwards converted the stock by a sale thereof under an allegation that they had falsely pretended to make the purchase and falsely pretended to resell the stock, and also falsely pretended to sell the stock held as collateral security to make up a deficiency, as the variance between the cause of action for a fictitious purchase and sale and one for conversion is beyond the power of amendment. Saltus v. Genlin, 7 Abb. Pr. 198, 8 Bosw. 257.

So, an allegation that the plaintiff deposited certain stocks with the defendant as collateral security for his indebtedness, and that it was the duty of the defendant to keep the stocks safely and hold them exclusively as such collateral security, and that the defendant fraudulently disposed of them, whereby the plaintiff lost them, sounds in tort, and cannot be joined with a count in assumpsit, and such misjoinder may be taken advantage of by writ of error. Stevens v. Hurlbut Bank, 31 Conn. 146.

And an allegation in an action for the conversion of stock pledged, that the plaintiff pledged certain stock to secure a loan, and that the defendant in consideration thereof undertook and promised to hold the stock as pledgee only, and not to sell or convert it without notifying plaintiff of his intention so to do, which he violated by a sale of the stock to the plaintiff's damage to the value of the stock, sets forth a cause of action ex delicto and not ex contractu, as the whole value of the stock pledged is made the measure of recovery, and not the mere excess of the proceeds of the sale thereof, and may therefore be amended by adding a count formally and substantially in case. Sharpe v. National Bank, 37 Ala. 644.

So, mere lapse of time is not a bar to an action by a pledgeor against a pledgee, for the conversion of the pledge by a sale thereof, in the absence of circumstances of equitable estoppel. Reynolds v. Cridge, 131 Pa. 189.

And while the holder of a note, to whom a bond has been pledged as collateral security, may avail himself of the statute of limitations as a defense to a suit upon the note if he does not sell the bond and apply the proceeds to the payment of the debt but collects it, he cannot claim that the note was outlawed and that therefore he had the right to treat the collateral as his absolute property, but the proceeds of the bond will be held to go to the payment of the debt, and the balance of the money to belong to the pledgeor, and can be recovered in an action for money had and received, the statute of limitations running against such an action only from the time when the pledgee received the money. Hancock v. Franklin Ins. Co. 114 Mass. 156.

But where a mortgage is assigned by the holder as security for his own promissory note, and there is a breach of the condition of the mortgage and assignment, and the assignee forecloses the mortgage and obtains seisin and possession of the land, after which the assignee sells the land, a bill in equity by the assignor to redeem the land, brought within twenty years from such sale and more than twenty years after possession is obtained, cannot be maintained. Stevens v. Dedham Inst. for Sav. 129 Mass. 547.

b. By way of defense.

While stock deposited as collateral security for an advance or loan may be disposed of for nonpayment thereof, its improper conversion constitutes a good defense to an action brought to recover the loan. Wallace v. Berdell, 24 Hun, 379.

And the pledgeor may set up a wrongful conversion by sale of the pledge on the part of the pledgee by way of defense in an action by the pledgee for the debt for which the pledge was made. Donnell v. Wyckoff, 49 N. J. L. 48; Buikley v. Welch, 81 Conn. 339; Waring v. Gaskill, 95 Ga. 731; Durant v. Einstein, 35 How. Pr. 231; Ainsworth v. Bowen, 9 Wis. 349.

Thus, a lender with whom a borrower deposited bonds as collateral security, who converts them to his own use by a sale, is not entitled to recover the money loaned without accounting to the borrower for the proceeds of the bonds. Stuart v. Bigler, 98 Pa. 80.

And the conversion of stock held by a broker for a customer does not operate as an extinguishment of the entire claim of the broker against the customer for advances, but simply gives the customer a cause of action for the damages which he sustained by reason of the conversion, which can be offset against any sum found due the broker. Levy v. Loeb, 15 Jones & S. 61, Affirmed, 75 N. Y. 609; Gruman v. Smith, 81 N. Y. 25. And see Star F. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 9 Jones & S. 287, supra, II. b, 3; Wicks v. Hatch, 62 N. Y. 535, 6 Jones & S. 95, supra, II. c, 1; Sitgreaves v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 49 Pa. 359, supra, V.

He is liable for the conversion of the pledge, but whether this would equal the amount of the claim or not would depend upon the facts developed. Gruman v. Smith, 81 N. Y. 25.

And where securities deposited as collateral for a debt were under the control of the president and general manager of the corporation which was the creditor, and he fraudulently abstracted and disposed of them and deprived the corporation of the power of performing its obligation to return them on payment, a receiver of the corporation after insolvency cannot recover the amount of the original indebtedness without allowing for the value of the securities received. Cutting v. Marlor, 17 Hun, 573.

And it has been held that where a broker who had purchased stock on a margin for a customer sells it without demanding additional margin, or giving notice that a sale will be made, it does not merely entitle the customer to a reduction of the broker's claim by the amount of loss proved to have been suffered because of the sale, but goes to the whole damages, as the broker, having failed to perform his contract, is not entitled to any recovery. Gillett v. Whiting, 120 N. Y. 402. And see Merwin v. Hamilton, 6 Duer, 244, supra, III. c.

In Gillett v. Whiting, 120 N. Y. 402, Baker v. Drake, 63 N. Y. 211, 13 Am. Rep. 507, infra, IX. b, was distinguished upon the ground that that was a case in which the customer was suing the broker for damages he had sustained by reason of a conversion of stock by the broker.

So, where a broker purchases gold coin for a customer, to pay for which the customer advances the amount in currency and deposits with the broker a sum of money as a margin, and the market value declines and the margin is not kept good and not made good after due notice, and a sale is fairly and justly made upon notice in such a manner as to obtain the actual market value, the customer is liable to pay the difference between the amount of indebtedness and the amount received for the coin as money laid out and expended at his request and for his use. Schepeler v. Eisner, 3 Daly, 11, Affirming 54 N. Y. 675.

And the disposal by the pledgee of collateral notes left with him by a pledgeor in a manner not within the purview of any power delegated to him and not within the manner prescribed by the policy and rules of law for the disposition and use of collateral security rendering the pledgee answerable as for a conversion thereof, is a violation of the contract of pledge and a part of the transaction leading up to the making of the original indebtedness, and is a wrongful conversion growing out of the same transaction, and is therefore a proper matter of set-off in an action upon the original indebtedness. Richardson v. Ashby, 132 Mo. 235.

And where stock is pledged as collateral security for the payment of a note, and the pledgee takes a mortgage as further security, the stock being at the time of greater value than the amount of the mortgage, and the pledgee disposes of the stock so as to be unable to redeliver it on redemption, the mortgage is to be credited on the foreclosure thereof with the value of the stock when executed. Ashton's Appeal, 73 Pa. 153.

So, a broker purchasing stock for a customer upon a margin, who sells it for failure to maintain the margin, is not prevented from recovering an unpaid balance of such customer by the fact that he had not paid for the stocks, where the purchase was made upon his credit and he was charged with and held liable for the price. Worthington v. Tormey, 34 Md. 162.

And an indorser of a note given by a debtor to a bank, which is secured to the bank by a pledge of certain stocks, which are afterwards sold by the bank to its own officers without notice, is entitled to avail himself of the equities between the bank and the principal debtor, in an action by the bank upon his indorsement. Sitgreaves v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 49 Pa. 359.

But an answer in an action upon a promissory note, as collateral security for which stock had been pledged, alleging that the plaintiff through its president had sold the stock and that he had purchased it stating the value thereof, is insufficient as a counterclaim, as upon such a state of facts the plaintiff would be entitled to recover the full amount due on the note and upon payment thereof the defendant would be entitled to his stock. Star F. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 9 Jones & S. 267.

A sale of bonds secured by mortgage held as collateral security at which the pledgee becomes the purchaser, however, remits the parties to their original rights, and does not cancel the bonds, but leaves them with all their original vigor, and the pledgeor has the right to set them up for the amount appearing on their face. Chicago Artesian Well Co. v. Corey, 60 Ill. 73.

And a sale of shawls held as collateral security for the payment of a note, the title remaining in the pledgeor, and their purchase by the pledgee, though irregular, simply leaves the title to the shawls in the pledgee as such, and the pledgeor is entitled to have their full value allowed upon the debt. Duden v. Waltsfelder, 16 Hun, 337.

So, in Mott v. Havana National Bank, 22 Hun, 354, it was held that one who sells an engine under a contract by which he retains title until payment must be treated as holding the engine after retaking possession as under a chattel mortgage or pledge, and where he himself purchased it at a sale to satisfy the indebtedness, the purchaser may prove the value thereof, and have it applied in satisfaction of the debt.

Trustees in insolvency of an original creditor who has wrongfully disposed of securities given him by his debtor stand in the same position with relation to the right of the debtor to set off the claim for such securities against the debt that the original creditor stood in. Bulkeley v. Welch, 31 Conn. 339.

And the burden of proof rests with the defendant, in an action upon a note brought by an indorsee against an indorser, to show that collateral securities received by the plaintiff for the payment of the note had been improperly disposed of. Vose v. Yulee, 4 Hun, 628.

See also, on this subject, First Nat. Bank v. Rush, 56 U. S. App. 556, 85 Fed. Rep. 539, 29 C. C. A. 333, 36 U. S. App. 248, 71 Fed. Rep. 102, 17 C. C. A. 627; Capron v. Thompson, 86 N. Y. 418, supra, VI.

c. As against purchasers from the pledgee.

The rule that a pledgee may recoup the amount of the debt secured by the pledge in an action for money had and received, brought by the pledgeor upon his sale of the thing pledged, applies where the suit is against the purchaser of the property who has converted it into money. Belden v. Perkins, 78 Ill. 449.

A purchaser in good faith and for value of property pledged, consisting of personal chattels, from the pledgee, however, succeeds to the right of the original pledge, and the owner of the property cannot recover the pledge in the same manner as if the case was a naked tort. Williams v. Ashe, 111 Cal. 180.

A transferee of stock pledged, if he is a bona fide holder for value without notice, cannot be guilty of a tort in disposing of the stock, even if the party who transferred it to him had exceeded his authority or broken his contract with the pledgeor. Felt v. Heye, 23 How. Pr. 359.

And an honest purchaser or bona fide holder of collateral that has been pledged by one who has converted it obtains a good title, and may be protected as against the real owner who has made the perpetration of the fraud possible. Myers v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 27 Abb. N. C. 266.

Where the owner of property in pledging it confers upon the pledgee an apparent title to or power of disposition over it he is estopped, as against an innocent purchaser from the apparent owner, without knowledge of the claims of the true owner, from asserting his title. 43 L. R. A.

McNeill v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, 7 Am. Rep. 341; Crocker v. Crocker, 31 N. Y. 507.

Thus, the pledge of a diamond in putting the pledgee into possession clothes him with the appearance of ownership, and a sale thereof to an innocent purchaser would be good; and in such case the pledgeor does not estop himself from proceeding against the pledgee for the conversion of the diamond by purchasing the same from such innocent purchaser. Hilgert v. Levin, 72 Mo. App. 48.

And where stock pledged has been sold bona fide without notice it cannot be pursued into the hands of a bona fide holder without notice of the pledge. Little v. Barker, Hoffm. Ch. 487.

And a pledgee of negotiable securities transferable by delivery should be treated as the agent of the owner, and the owner should be bound by his acts, and where he transfers such securities pledged to a third party who takes it in good faith the pledgeor loses all right to them. Colt v. Humbert, 5 Cal. 260, 68 Am. Dec. 128.

Where one receives a note as collateral security for money advanced at the time of the indorsement, or for any consideration then arising, he is treated as having received it for value, and is entitled to recover the amount of the maker. Tarbell v. Sturtevant, 26 Vt. 513.

And that a note was held as collateral security by an indorsee, and that an assignee of the note had tendered to the indorsee the amount due him, are inadmissible as a defense in a suit by the indorsee against the maker of the note. Ibid.

But an innocent holder of collateral which has been converted by the pledgee will be allowed to use it only in such manner and to such an extent as will secure his own interests, and operate also to the protection of the original owner. Myers v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 27 Abb. N. C. 266.

And while as a general rule a pledgee recovering on an instrument held as collateral is entitled to recover the entire amount, recovering any surplus for the use of the principal debtor, where the collateral is in the hands of a bona fide holder without notice of a good defense against his assignor, the rule is that the pledgee can recover the amount of his principal debt only. Union Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 45 Wis. 373.

And a purchaser of a watch at a pawn broker's sale, made without notice to the owner, is entitled when sued for the conversion of the watch to reduce the damages by the amount of money due the pledgee, where it was pawned by the husband of the owner under an authority to raise money thereon, but without authority to authorize a sale without notice. Van Arsdale v. Joiner, 44 Ga. 173.

A purchaser of notes from a pledgee with notice that they were merely held by him in pledge, however, is not protected by the fact that the pledgeor at the time of making the pledge indorsed the notes in blank. Goldsmidt v. First M. E. Church, 25 Minn. 202.

And where stock is hypothecated to secure the payment of a note, and it is sold under execution on a judgment against the pledgee, the pledgeor is entitled to relief where the purchaser had notice of the hypothecation before the sale. Rogers v. New Jersey Ins. Co. 8 N. J. Eq. 167.

So, an accommodation note executed for the purpose of being used as collateral to secure an indebtedness of the payee to a bank, and indorsed for that purpose, which is afterwards sold by an indorsee to satisfy his own debt, can be enforced only to the extent necessary to secure the bank, where it was indorsed after maturity, and the holders under such indorsement took it with notice of the defense and equities of the maker. First Nat. Bank v. Werst, 52 Iowa, 684.

And non-negotiable paper transferred by a pledgee thereof is subject to the same defense in the hands of the assignee as in the hands of the pledgee, as he can convey no greater right to it than he himself possessed. Chouteau v. Allen, 70 Mo. 290.

And where a note is pledged on a tortious misappropriation by the agent of the owner, and the pledgee without notice of the owner's rights sells it and receives the proceeds, and the owner subsequently demands the note of him without effect, the evidence of the conversion is sufficient. Keutgen v. Parks, 2 Sandf. 60.

So, a pledgee cannot give away the pledge so as to affect the rights of a pledgeor, and a pretended and merely colorable sale without consideration will not divest the pledgeor of his rights as such, or confer upon the pretended purchaser any greater interest than that held by the pledgee. Norton v. Baxter, 41 Minn. 146, 4 L. R. A. 305.

And the act of the pledgee of two diamond rings in changing the settings of the diamonds and giving them away, constitutes a conversion thereof, and gives no right of possession to the rings to the donee as against the owner. Sheridan v. Pressas, 18 Misc. 180.

And a creditor of a pledgee who takes property pledged with him in satisfaction of an antecedent debt of his own, is not a holder for value as against the pledgeor, but takes the title of the original pledgee, and cannot hold the property as against the pledgeor after a tender and an offer to redeem. Torrey v. Harris, 12 Daly, 385.

So, while the fact that a holder of bonds of a corporation as collateral security is a director thereof does not charge a purchaser from him with constructive notice of his want of power to sell, where the bonds are taken from a director in pledge for a precedent debt, the pledgee gets no better title than his pledgeor. Duncomb v. New York, H. & N. E. Co. 84 N. Y. 190.

But the mere fact that a certificate of stock transferred by a pledgee was in the name of the pledgeor is not sufficient to charge the transferee with notice, or to put him upon inquiry, where it was accompanied with a full power of attorney authorizing the transfer. Felt v. Heye, 23 How. Pr. 359.

And the equities of a pledgeor of a mortgage attach to it in the hands of a subsequent assignee for full value without notice. Bush v. Lathrop, 22 N. Y. 535.

And an implication that a holder of stocks has no authority to sell or hypothecate them in the usual course of business does not arise from the fact that the person holding the legal title is styled "trustee." Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 139.

And there is nothing in the mere fact of the disposition by a bank of certificates of mining stock issued in the name of different parties and indorsed by them as trustees as collateral security, to put them upon inquiry as to the ownership of the stocks, and as to whether the bank held them as collateral or not. Gass v. Hampton, 18 Nev. 185.

A pledgee of stocks as collateral to the payment of a note, who exchanges any of the collaterals with the maker of the note for other stocks of equal value, would take the latter as security for a pre-existing debt, but would be purchaser of them to the extent of the consideration.

given in exchange. Cherry v. Frost, 7 Lea, 1.

And a bona fide purchaser of stock or other property which had been held as collateral security for a usurious loan may be compelled to surrender it under the New York statutes of 1837, even where the assignee of the stock is not the assignee of the debt. Little v. Barker, Hoffm. Ch. 487.

On this subject with relation to transfers of stock, see also cases supra, II. c. 2. And see Conyngham's Appeal, 57 Pa. 474.

IX. Measure of damages.

a. As to personal property generally.

When property converted by a sale thereof by a pledgee has a fixed value, the measure of damages is that value with legal interest from the time of the conversion. Douglass v. Kraft, 9 Cal. 562.

The value of the pledge at the time of the conversion. Ainsworth v. Bowen, 9 Wis. 349; Johnson v. Stear, 15 C. B. N. S. 330, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 130, 10 Jur. N. S. 99, 9 L. T. N. S. 538, 12 Week. Rep. 347; Beiden v. Perkins, 78 Ill. 449; Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cal. Cas. 200.

The value of the article less the amount for which it was pledged. Rosensweig v. Frazer, 82 Ind. 342; Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass. 389.

Or allowed as a payment pro tanto for the debt. Donnell v. Wyckoff, 49 N. J. L. 48.

Thus, the measure of damages for the conversion of a watch pledged by a sale thereof without notice, in an action against the purchaser, is the value of the watch less the money advanced thereon by the pledgee. Van Arsdale v. Joiner, 44 Ga. 173.

And the measure of damages in an action of trover against a pledgee in disposing of gold coin pledged as security for becoming bail, which afterwards rises in value much above par, is the value of the coin at the time it was converted, and not its value when the verdict is rendered. Frothingham v. Morse, 45 N. H. 545.

And the damages in an action for money had and received must be limited to the amount received with interest, and cannot be enhanced by its increase in value as merchandise. Ibid.

So, a pledgee with power of sale which he has exercised, who refuses to account for the proceeds, will be charged with the goods pledged at the highest market price. Simes v. Zane, 1 Phila. 501.

So, where the owner of property pledged and converted has recovered it, the measure of his damage is the expense he has necessarily incurred, and the value of the time he has spent in recovering it, together with the value of the use of the property, if any, while he was wrongfully deprived of it, not exceeding the total value of the property at the time of the conversion. First Nat. Bank v. Rush, 56 U. S. App. 556, 85 Fed. Rep. 539, 29 C. C. A. 333.

The amount of damages in an action for conversion of property by a pledgee by a sale thereof is a question for the jury, and the jury is not limited to the price on the day of the conversion. Douglass v. Kraft, 9 Cal. 562.

b. As to stocks, bonds, and other securities.

The rule has been laid down generally, that the measure of damages in trover for conversion of stock pledged by an unlawful sale by the pledgee is the market value of the stock. Seymour v. Ives, 46 Conn. 109; Brewster v. Van Liew, 119 Ill. 554, 59 Am. Rep. 823; Loomis v. Stave, 72 Ill. 623; Jamison's Estate, 163 Pa. 143.

And not the amount of money which may have been paid upon the contract by the customer with interest. Brewster v. Van Llew, 119 Ill. 534, 59 Am. Rep. 823.

And not the highest price which had been paid for such bonds in a particular case. Loomis v. Stave, 72 Ill. 623.

And in some of the Pennsylvania cases it is held to be such value at the time of the conversion. Jamison's Estate, 163 Pa. 143; Neller v. Kelley, 69 Pa. 403.

With interest from the date of conversion. Neller v. Kelley, 69 Pa. 403.

Thus, the measure of damages for the conversion of stock pledged by a sale thereof, without notice and because the debtor declined to pay another debt not included in the pledge, is the real value of the collateral at the date of the sale. Blood v. Erie Dime Sav. L. Co. 164 Pa. 95; Washburn v. Pond, 2 Allen, 474.

And in adjusting an account between a pledgee who had pledged stock as collateral to his note, and the pledgee who had sold the stock without proper notice and sued the pledgee for the balance, the pledgee is entitled to credit for the actual value of the collateral at the time of the sale. Waring v. Gaskill, 95 Ga. 731.

The ground work of an action for the conversion of stock pledged by a private sale thereof without authority is the sale and transfer of the stock, and not the refusal to accept the tender and comply with a demand for a return of the stock, and the proper measure of damages is the actual value of the stock at the time of such conversion deducting the amount of the debt due by way of recoupment, and not the value of the stocks at their highest market value on the day of the trial or any other date before that time, and after the demand. Baltimore Marine Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 269.

Where a demand is necessary, however, the conversion of stock by a broker by a refusal to transfer it to a customer upon demand and tender occurs upon the refusal to deliver, and not upon his disposition of the stock, and the measure of damages therefor is the value of the property at the time of the conversion with damages for detention which should bear legal interest from the conversion to judgment, and any special damage which might legitimately arise out of matters in existence at the time of the conversion. Boylan v. Huguet, 8 Nev. 345.

And the owner of stock pledged as collateral security for an indebtedness, which stock was sold by the pledgee and the proceeds appropriated to his own use without authority, is entitled after demanding the stock and offering to pay his debt, which demand was refused on the pretense that the pledgee had a right to hold the stock pledged for the debt of a third person, to recover the market value of the stock on the day of the demand with interest, less the amount of his debt, without further demand or tender, though at the time of the demand he did not tender any money, the pledgee not objecting on that ground. Flaher v. Brown, 104 Mass. 259, 6 Am. Rep. 235.

And one who pledges stock as collateral security for a debt payable on demand, with authority, in case of a failure to meet any demand, to sell the stock or a sufficient portion thereof to pay the amount due and demanded, which stock is sold by the pledgee without demand or notice, is entitled to recover for such wrongful conversion the highest market value of the stock at any time between the time of the conversion and the time of the trial,—especially where after the conversion an effort was made to procure the stock to be replaced and considerable time was consumed in correspondence and negotiations before the pledgee finally refused to replace it. Romaine v. Van Allen, 28 N. Y. 309.

The sale of a pledge by the pledgee is not ipso facto a conversion which will create a cause of action in favor of the pledgee, so as to require the plaintiff's damages to be the value of the certificate at that time, but it is wrongful, and the pledgee may, at his option, so consider it, and tender or offer to pay his debt and demand his pledge or sue for damages for the sale thereof, so that the cause of action will not accrue until the demand and refusal, and the measure of damages is the value at that time. Hopper v. Smith, 68 How. Pr. 34.

In the above case, Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235, Baker v. Drake, 53 N. Y. 211, 13 Am. Rep. 507, and Gruman v. Smith, 81 N. Y. 25, and similar cases were distinguished upon the ground that in those cases the stock was held by the pledgee subject to the order of the pledgee, and for the express purpose of being sold at his direction, and the unauthorized sale was an entire destruction of the contract rendering a demand unnecessary. And it was said that all the cases in this state involving the right of the pledgee to maintain trover for a sale of the pledge are stock cases or cases in which the debt had been tendered or has been extinguished.

So, the general rule that the measure of damages for conversion is the market value of the property at the time of the conversion has been held not applicable to the conversion of stocks and bonds by a broker by an improper sale thereof, as they are commercial securities of a fluctuating value in the market. Dimock v. United States Nat. Bank, 55 N. J. L. 296; Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443, 51 Am.-Dec. 307.

And the rule has been adopted by some of the cases that where property converted by a sale thereof by a pledgee is of fluctuating value, the pledgee may recover the highest value at the time of the conversion or at any time afterwards. Douglass v. Kraft, 9 Cal. 562; Rankin v. McCullough, 12 Barb. 103.

Within this rule the measure of damages in an action by a pledgee against a pledgee for the unlawful sale of the stocks pledged where suit is brought without unreasonable delay, is the highest price of the stock between the date of the sale and commencement of the suit. Wilson v. Little, 1 Sandf. 361; Bates v. Wiles, 1 Handy (Ohio) 532.

Or, as it is given in some of the cases, the highest market value of the stock between the date of the conversion and the trial. Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235; Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443, 51 Am. Dec. 307; Lawrence v. Maxwell, 64 Barb. 102; Conyngham's Appeal, 57 Pa. 474.

Especially where time was given to the pledgee at his request to replace the stock, and the pledgee failed to replace it at a reduced price, relying on the expectation that the pledgee would do it. Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443, 51 Am. Dec. 307.

The prevailing doctrine, however, and the one which seems to have been adopted by the later New York cases, is that the rule that a pledgee is entitled to damages for the conversion by the pledgee of the thing pledged, measured by the highest market price between the time of the conversion and the time of the trial, does not apply where it was agreed between the parties that the property was to be sold when it reached a certain price, and it was of such a character that it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to have preserved it until a subsequent time when a higher price was reached. Matthews v. Coe, 49 N. Y. 57.

And that where stocks are held not as an investment, the object of the transaction being the realization of profit by their sale, and the broker supplies all the capital embarked in the speculation except the margin, and the broker sells the same without notice, if upon becoming informed of the sale the customer desires further to prosecute the adventure, he has the right to disaffirm the sale and require the broker to replace the stock, and if he fails or refuses to do so, his remedy is to do it himself, and charge the broker with the loss sustained in doing so, which would be the advance in the market price of the stock from the time of the sale up to a reasonable time to replace it, after receiving notice thereof. Baker v. Drake, 53 N. Y. 211, 13 Am. Rep. 507.

In the above case, Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 253, was overruled so far as it holds that the measure of damages for the wrongful disposition of stocks pledged is the highest market value which it reaches after such disposition down to the date of the trial.

So, under this doctrine the measure of damages in an action by a customer against a stock broker for the conversion of stock purchased and held by him for the customer for speculation by a sale thereof without notice is what it would have cost the customer to replace the stock on a day within a reasonable time after the sale, deducting the sum due to the broker. Baker v. Drake, 68 N. Y. 518, 23 Am. Rep. 80.

And the measure of damages in an action by an owner of securities whose agent has pledged them without authority, which act he has ratified, for the conversion of the securities by the pledgee by an unlawful sale, is the market value of his securities within a reasonable time after his discovery of the conversion less the amount actually due the pledgee for money advanced upon them. Smith v. Savin, 69 Hun, 811.

And where stocks purchased and carried by a firm of brokers for a customer, and others deposited by the customer to secure his margin, are wrongfully sold by the broker, the measure of the customer's damage is the value of the stock deposited as security for the margin at the time when its return was demanded, with interest, and the difference between the market value of the stock purchased and carried at a reasonable time after the sale and the cost price of the broker's purchase thereof with interest after allowing and deducting therefrom interest upon the cost of the stock purchased and carried from the date of the purchase, and the commissions earned. Brass v. Worth, 40 Barb. 648.

So, the measure of damages for the conversion of stocks by a pledgee to whom they were pledged as collateral security by selling them before the maturity of the principal debt is the highest intermediate market value between the time of the conversion and a reasonable time after notice of the conversion within which to replace the securities. Dimock v. United States Nat. Bank, 55 N. J. L. 296.

And the measure of damages for the conversion of stock of a principal by a broker by selling the same without directions is the highest intermediate value of the stock between the time of its conversion and a reasonable time after the owner has received notice of the conversion, to enable him to replace it. Gallagher v. Jones, 129 U. S. 193, 32 L. ed. 658; Wright v. Bank of the Metropolis, 110 N. Y. 237, 1 L. R. A. 289.

Less the debt secured thereby with interest. Wright v. Bank of the Metropolis, 110 N. Y. 237, 1 L. R. A. 289.

And the question as to what is reasonable time for an owner of pledged stock which had been unlawfully sold to replace it, is one of law 43 L. R. A.

for the court, when the facts are undisputed, and different inferences cannot be reasonably drawn from the same facts. Ibid.

So, the measure of damages in an action for selling more pledged scrip than was necessary to pay the indebtedness is the difference between the price for which the scrip was sold and the price paid by the pledgee to replace it. Fitzgerald v. Blocher, 32 Ark. 742, 29 Am. Rep. 3.

And where a broker sells stock of his principal of his own motion, and without notice to the principal, he is only liable for any advance on the stock that takes place up to the time when the principal received notice of the sale, and had time to replace it by the purchase of new stock. Gallagher v. Jones, 129 U. S. 193, 32 L. ed. 658.

And a stock broker who purchased and carried bonds on marginal security for a customer, and sold them without authority, becomes liable for the subsequently enhanced market value of the bonds and coupons less the amount of his own claims. Read v. Lambert, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 428.

A broker who has converted stock of a customer held on a margin by selling the same without notice is entitled to a reasonable time after notice of the sale to replace the stock, and if in the meantime it advances in price, the customer would be entitled to the difference in price. Gruman v. Smith, 81 N. Y. 25.

But a customer for whom a broker purchases and carries certain shares of stock under agreement, which stock is sold without authority, after which the customer is notified of the sale, is entitled to recover nominal damages only, where it appears for thirty days after the sale the stock could have been purchased in the market at the price for which it was sold, or for a less price. Colt v. Owens, 90 N. Y. 368.

And the dismissal of the complaint in an action by the assignee of stock brokers against a customer for an alleged balance due on a speculative account on the ground that the stock brokers had sold stock purchased by them for the customer on a margin without notice, is error where there was evidence in the case tending to show that the stock sold could have been repurchased in open market within the next fifteen days below the price realized on the sale. Minor v. Beveridge, 141 N. Y. 399.

Where pledgees convert the subject of the pledge to their own use by making an unauthorized sale of it, the transaction operates as a payment of the debt to the extent of the value of the property, and if the value exceeds the debt the pledgeors are entitled to damages for the market value of the property converted less the amount of the debt, the measure being the difference between the two amounts. Kilpatrick v. Dean, 19 N. Y. S. R. 837.

And where a broker sells, without due notice, stock purchased by him for a customer on a margin, holding it in pledge to secure the advance made by him for the purchase, he does not thereby, as matter of law, extinguish all claim against the customer for the advance, but the customer is entitled to be allowed as damages the difference between the price for which the stock sold and for which he received credit and its market price then or within such reasonable time after notice of sale as would have enabled him to replace the stock in case the market price exceeded the price realized. Minor v. Beveridge, 141 N. Y. 399.

In the above case, Gillett v. Whitting, 120 N. Y. 402, supra, VIII. b, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the sole question presented on the appeal was, the customer's right to have the jury charged that a sale of his stock by a broker without notice was a conversion, and the effect of the conversion if found by the jury was not presented on the appeal.

So, the rule has been laid down that a pledgee of collateral security who makes an unauthorized sale thereof is chargeable with what would have been received for it had he retained it until the equity of redemption had been foreclosed by a sale upon notice according to law. Conyngham's Appeal, 67 Pa. 474.

The owner of stock pledged as collateral security and wrongfully sold by the pledgee is entitled to be placed in the same position as if the sale had not been made, and the pledgee may be charged with the market value of the shares at the time of filing a bill in equity to redeem though it was sold for the full market price at the time. Fowle v. Ward, 113 Mass. 548, 18 Am. Rep. 534.

And the measure of damages where stock is purchased by a broker on a margin and sold for failure to keep the margin good without giving the customer an opportunity to redeem, is the difference in the market price of the stock on the day fixed for its delivery to the customer, and the contract price. North v. Phillips, 89 Pa. 250.

And a pledgee of stock which has been unlawfully sold by the pledgee is at liberty, where there were several applications made to the pledgee for the return of the stock, to regard the last application, and the omission then to return it, as the final breach of duty, and he may recover for the value of the stock at that time. Wilson v. Little, 1 Sandf. 351.

The nonwarranted sale of stock purchased by a stock broker for a customer, however, does not entitle the customer to recover back money deposited with which to make the purchase and maintain a margin, but simply leaves the pledgee liable for damages, if any, sustained by the pledgee through such sale. Morgan v. Jaudon, 40 How. Pr. 366.

And the sale by a pledgee of stocks pledged at private sale without authority is a breach of a legal duty arising out of a contract, and the damages therefor should be compensatory only. Baltimore Marine Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 269.

And only the amount received can be recovered in an action for money had and received brought by a customer against a broker who had sold stock which he was carrying for him upon a margin in which overcharges of interest were alleged, as such an action waives the tort. Wagner v. Peterson, 83 Pa. 238.

Upon the other hand, however, it has been held that the measure of damages for the conversion by a broker of stocks purchased for a customer and held subject to his order, by an illegal sale thereof, does not depend upon the form of the action, but is the same whether it is for the conversion or in assumpsit. Brewster v. Van Liew, 119 Ill. 554, 59 Am. Rep. 823.

And that the measure of damages for the conversion of stock pledged by an unauthorized private sale thereof is the same whether the action therefor is treated as a special action in case or as an action in trover. Baltimore Marine Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 269.

Damages to which a pledgee of stock is entitled for its conversion by an illegal sale thereof may be established by showing its dividend-paying capacity, where there is no evidence of the market value. Greer v. Lafayette County Bank, 128 Mo. 559.

And an agreement between a pledgee of stock deposited to secure the payment of his note and another by which the other was to take the stocks and allow the pledgee $75 per share on an indebtedness due him, does not set the value of the stock at $75 per share as a measure of damages in an action by the pledgee against the pledgee for its conversion by an unlawful sale at $60 per share, that being the highest market price of the stock during the period covered by the transaction. Seymour v. Ives, 46 Conn. 109.

The damages for the conversion of dock warrants by a pledgee with whom they were deposited as security for a loan by a sale thereof are to be measured by the losses actually sustained, and the interest of the pledgee at the time of the conversion is to be taken into account. Johnson v. Stear, 15 C. B. N. S. 330, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 130, 10 Jur. N. S. 99, 9 L. T. N. S. 538, 12 Week. Rep. 347.

And a pledgee of a receiver's certificate who pledged it under a contract that the pledgee would redeliver it to him when the debt was paid, or if collected would pay the balance to him after deducting the costs of collecting, who tenders the debt and interest and demands a certificate, and is informed that it had been sold, is entitled to recover the value of the certificate as of the time of the tender and demand. Hopper v. Smith, 63 How. Pr. 34.

And while the disposition of a warrant pledged by the pledgee without giving the pledgee an opportunity to redeem it or any notice of sale after the indebtedness secured is due, is a conversion which would render the pledgee liable for the value of the warrant at the time of the conversion with legal interest from that day, the recovery of the value of such warrant cannot be had where the pledgee has credited the pledgee with the full value of the warrant, and he has received the benefit of what he would recover if the action could be maintained. Reardon v. Patterson, 19 Mont. 231.

c. As notes and other choses in action.

Collateral securities are held by a creditor as the agent or trustee of his debtor to be collected for the benefit of the debtor in discharge of the principal debt, and if he undertakes to transfer them to third persons without the authority of the principal debtor he will be held to have elected to take them for the amount due upon their face in satisfaction to that extent of the principal debt. Hawks v. Hinchcliff, 17 Barb. 492.

And the amount expressed upon the face of notes placed in the hands of another as collateral security for a specified purpose with interest from their maturity up to the time of the conversion and then interest on the aggregate from that time to the verdict, is the proper measure of damages for their conversion where the pledgee puts it out of his power to redeliver them when the purposes for which they were pledged are satisfied. St. John v. O'Connell, 7 Port. (Ala.) 466. And see Hassard v. Duke, 64 Ind. 220, supra, II. b. 4.

It is the value of the pledge at the time of the conversion in excess of the demand secured by it with legal interest thereon from the time of the conversion. Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 125.

So, the measure of damages in an action against the maker of a note, brought by an indorsee to whom it had been delivered as collateral security for the payment of notes discounted for the benefit of the indorser, is the amount due on the debts embraced by the security, and it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show what debts were intended to be secured by the pledge, and the amounts remaining due thereon. Maitland v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 40 Md. 540, 17 Am. Rep. 620.

And a pledgee of a mortgage note in whose hands it had been placed to secure a debt due him from the pledgee, who sells the property mortgaged for a sum less than the amount of the note, and immediately resells it for a larger sum than that of the amount of the note, becomes liable to the pledgeor, not for the price at which the property was resold, but merely for the amount of the note. Richardson v. Mann, 30 La. Ann. 1060.

But while an obligor is usually entitled prima facie to the face value of money securities converted by a pledgee, the pledgee has the right to show, in reduction of damages, the payment in whole or in part, the inability of the maker to pay, a release, invalidity of the instrument, or any other matter which would legitimately affect or diminish its value, the proper measure of damages being the value of such security at the time of the conversion, with interest to the time of trial. Walley v. Deseret Nat. Bank, 14 Utah, 305.

And the measure of damages in an action by a pledgeor against the pledgee for damages for the wrongful conversion of a note where there was evidence that the maker of the note, though honest, was regarded as in falling circumstances, and that the best paper in the country was at a large discount, is not the face value of the note, but its market value. Brightman v. Reeves, 21 Tex. 70.

And the measure of damages for a disposition by a pledgee of notes pledged as collateral security not authorized by law or by any agreement of the parties by way of set-off in an action on the original indebtedness, where it appears that the collateral was not worth its face value, is its actual value at the time of the disposition of the same by the pledgee. Richardson v. Ashby, 132 Mo. 238.

So, the fact that the maker of a note pledged as security kept his property concealed or covered up in the name of other parties, where it could not be found or reached by execution, would tend, if shown, to affect the value of his paper, and is properly admissible on the question of the amount of damages in an action by the pledgeor against the pledgee for the conversion of the note. Walley v. Deseret Nat. Bank, 14 Utah, 305.

And it is competent for the defendant in an action by a pledgeor against a pledgee of a note for the conversion of the note to show in his defense, in reduction of damages, the insolvency or inability of the maker to pay, or any other matter which would legitimately affect or diminish its value, or which would tend to show insolvency or want of business integrity. Ibid.

And the proper return of executions nullo bona issued upon valid judgments against the maker of a note is prima facie evidence of his insolvency at the time, in an action by the pledgeor of the note against the pledgee for a conversion thereof. Ibid.

And the testimony of the maker of a note in an action by a pledgeor against a pledgee thereof for its conversion, to the effect that he had a short time before stated that he had no property that creditors could reach, is admissible as tending to show his financial ability and as affecting his credit as a witness, and as contradicting and qualifying his testimony in chief, where he had given testimony to show his solvency and ability to pay his debts. Ibid.

The defendant in an action by a pledgeor against the pledgee for the conversion of notes pledged is limited in his proof, however, to the market value of the notes and the solvency or insolvency of the maker for a period between the date of the pledge and the date of the alleged conversion, and is precluded from showing their value or the insolvency of the maker during the following year. Ibid. F. ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to obtain the partition of certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Burket, J.:

Margaret C. McNicoll commenced her action against Claribel Ives for the partition of certain real estate situate in the city of Cincinnati, and fully described in the second item of the will of Peter McNicoll, deceased. The cause was heard in the court of common pleas, and there was a finding of facts made, separate from the conclusions of law. The entire will of Peter McNicoll appears in the finding of facts, but only so much thereof is given here as relates to the controversy in hand. The court finds as follows:

(1) That Peter McNicoll a citizen and resident of Hamilton county, Ohio, died in the year 1852, leaving his will, which was duly admitted to probate in said county, the second item of which is as follows: "I give and devise unto my son, Henry McNicoll, for the term of his natural life, and at his decease to go to the heirs of his body in fee, the following described real estate, to wit." (Here follows a description of the real estate sought to be partitioned.)

(2) That the testator's son, Henry McNicoll, in the year 1855, was married to Mary Galbraith, and the defendant, Claribel Ives, is the only offspring of such marriage. In the year 1863, Mary Galbraith McNicoll, the mother of the defendant, was granted a decree of divorce from Henry McNicoll by the court of common pleas of Hamilton county, Ohio.

(3) That Elizabeth Meyer, who is the mother of the plaintiff, Margaret C. McNicoll, was married in Newport, Campbell county, Kentucky, on the 10th day of De-camber, 1867, to Samuel P. Reasoner, who was then a soldier in the United States army, stationed at the Newport Barracks. That said Samuel P. Reasoner was discharged July 13, 1869, at Newport Barracks, Kentucky, but he again enlisted in the army of the United States on the 27th day of December, 1869, at Cincinnati, Ohio, for a period of five years, and served in Company H. of the 18th regiment of the United States infantry. On January 10, 1870, Samuel P. Reasoner went with his regiment to the state of South Carolina, where he continued in the service of the United States, in the army, until the 27th of December, 1874, when he was duly discharged at Columbia, South Carolina, and where he was again married on the 7th day of January, 1875. He then became domiciled in Columbia, South Carolina, where he has ever since continued to reside; and he never left the state of South Carolina, or returned to the state of Kentucky, after the 10th day of January, 1870. The court finds as a matter of fact that there was absolutely nonaccess and nonintercourse between said Samuel P. Reasoner and Elizabeth Reasoner, his wife,—that is to say, they never saw each other, never met each other, and never lived or cohabited together,—after the 13th day of July, 1869, up to and including the time of the present trial.

(4) Elizabeth Reasoner continued to reside in the state of Kentucky from July 13, 1869, until the year 1878, and was not absent from that state or the state of Ohio during that entire period of time. The testator's son, Henry McNicoll, an unmarried man, who then and thereafter was a citizen of, and resided and had his domicile in, Cincinnati, Ohio, became intimate with Elizabeth Reasoner in Newport, Kentucky, in 1875 and thereafter, and was the father of the plaintiff, Margaret C. McNicoll, who was born in Newport, Kentucky, on the 10th day of September, 1876.

(5) About the year 1878, Elizabeth Reasoner removed with her daughter, the plaintiff, to Cincinnati, Ohio, and on the 23d day of April A. D. 1899, she obtained a divorce from her husband, Samuel P. Reasoner, by the judgment of the common pleas court of Hamilton county, Ohio.

(6) On the 27th day of June, 1889, the said Henry McNicoll and Elizabeth Reasoner, mother of the plaintiff, were married in the city of Covington, Kenton county, Kentucky. They thereafter lived for one year in Cincinnati, Ohio, and then for two years in Dayton, in Campbell county, Kentucky, when they removed to Clermont county, Ohio, and there resided until the 19th day of December, 1893, when Henry McNicoll died. That said Henry McNicoll was a citizen of, and resided and had his domicile in, the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, continuously from the year 1870 up to and including the period of one year after his said marriage on the 27th day of June, 1889.

(7) At all times from her birth, in September, 1876, until his death, in December, 1893, Henry McNicoll recognized and acknowledged the said Margaret C. McNicoll as his daughter, and after his marriage with her mother she resided in the family of Henry McNicoll, who provided for her education and support, and by and in his last will and testament, which was duly admitted to probate, he recognized her as his daughter, and named her in his said will and testament as one of his heirs and devisees.

(8) The plaintiff, Margaret C. McNicoll, and Claribel Ives are the only children or descendants of Henry McNicoll who survived him. The property described in the petition is the property devised by Peter McNicoll in the second item of his will to Henry McNicoll for life, and to the heirs of his body upon his death.

(9) During all the time mentioned the following provision has been a part of the statute law of the state of Kentucky (Kentucky Rev. Stat. § 1398): "If a man having had a child by a woman shall afterwards marry her, such child, or its descendants, if recognized by him before or after marriage, shall be deemed legitimate." And the court of appeals of Kentucky, which is the court of last resort in that state, in the year 1887 decided in the case of Sams v. Sams, 85 Ky. 396, that the foregoing statute of Kentucky does not apply to a case where a man had children during the coverture of the man with another woman, and who might afterwards marry; which said case and the statement of the law contained in said decision is now the law of the state of Kentucky. And the court makes the decision of the case of Sams v. Sams a part of this finding of fact, which, by agreement of parties in open court, may be considered as a part hereof as fully as though the same were herein set forth at large. And the said case of Sams v. Sams, as it appears reported in said volume of said Kentucky reports, may be referred to as constituting a part of this finding of facts.

Upon the facts so found the court found as a conclusion of law that Margaret C. McNicoll is seized in fee as a tenant in common with Claribel Ives of the undivided one half of the real estate in controversy, and ordered partition, to all of which Claribel Ives excepted, and filed her petition in error in the circuit court, seeking to reverse the judgment of the court of common pleas. The circuit court affirmed the judgment, one judge dissenting. Thereupon Claribel Ives filed her petition in this court seeking to reverse the judgment of the courts below.

Messrs. Kittredge & Wilby, for plaintiff in error:

If Margaret is not the legitimate daughter of Henry McNicoll, she cannot take under the will of Peter McNicoll as one of the heirs of the body of Henry McNicoll.

Margaret was begotten and born in Kentucky, and at the time of her begetting and birth her mother, Mrs. Reasoner, resided in Kentucky; and the subsequent marriage of Henry McNicoll to Mrs. Reasoner was in Kentucky.

The court of appeals of Kentucky has construed the Kentucky statute in Sams v. Sams, 85 Ky. 396, holding that it does not confer legitimacy upon an adulterine bastard.

A proper construction or application of the Ohio statute excludes from its operation an adulterine bastard; and the interpretation given to the like Kentucky statute by the Kentucky court of appeals in the Sams Case, supra, was correct.

In Scotland, where the practice of legitimating by subsequent marriage has long prevailed, the theory upon which such legitimating of bastards proceeds is by means of the assumption that at the date of the cohabitation which produced the bastard valid promises to marry had been exchanged between persons who at that time were capable of performing such promises to marry, and that the subsequent marriage between those parties was in performance of those promises, and related back, therefore, to the date of the cohabitation.

Munro v. Munro, 7 Clark & F. 872.

The correct statement of the purpose of the legislature in passing this statute may be found in Wallace v. Rappleye, 103 Ill. 229.

The doctrine is one founded in public policy, which has in view, partly, at least, the discouragement of illicit commerce between the sexes and the fostering of marriage and the sustaining of the interests of the family created by lawful marriage.

The marriage necessary to legitimate previously born bastards must be a valid marriage.

Burket, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While the court finds that Mr. Reasoner and Mrs. Reasoner were married at a certain time, and that she obtained a divorce from him at a certain time thereafter, there is no finding that he obtained a divorce from her; and as, in reviewing a judgment based upon a finding of facts, facts not found are regarded as not existing, this record must be construed as showing that Mrs. Reasoner was the wife of Mr. Reasoner at the time her daughter, Margaret C., was begotten. The court finds, in effect, that the child, Margaret C., is the offspring of Henry McNicoll, an unmarried man, and Mrs. Reasoner, a married woman. The child is, therefore, what is known as an "adulterine bastard," begotten of an adulterous connection between a man and woman who at that time could not make a valid contract of marriage. The legal obstacle to their marriage was afterwards removed by divorce obtained by her, and they were shortly thereafter legally married, and the child at once became a member of his family, and was recognized and acknowledged by him as his child, up to the time of his death, and was so treated in his last will and testament. The child now claims that she was and is thereby legitimated under our statute, and entitled to one half of the property devised by Peter McNicoll to Henry McNicoll for the term of his natural life, and at his decease to go to the heirs of his body; while Clairbel Ives, the only child of Henry McNicoll begotten in lawful wedlock, claims that an adulterine bastard cannot become legitimated under our statute by the subsequent marriage of the parents, and that, therefore, Margaret C. McNicoll has no interest in the property, and is not entitled to have partition thereof.

By the civil law, the law of Scotland, and the Code Napoleon, an adulterine bastard could not become legitimated by the subsequent legal marriage of the parents. All bastards who were the offspring of parents who might legally marry at the time of begetting such bastards might become legitimated by the subsequent marriage of the parents followed by an acknowledgment of the child by the father as being his child. Under the common law of England there could be no legitimating of bastards, whether adulterine or otherwise. This was the state of the law in Europe as to legitimating bastards when our first statute on the subject was passed,—Feb. 22, 1805 (3 Ohio Laws, p. 281). Our statute of that date is a transcript of the statute of Virginia on the same subject passed in 1785, and entitled "An Act Concerning the Course of Descents." 12 Henning's Stat. p. 139. The bill was drafted and reported by a committee, of which Thomas Jefferson was one, after some years of deliberation, and was adopted by the Virginia legislature, omitting the exception of the civil law and the law of Scotland as to adulterine bastards, and disregarding the common law of England, which prevented all bastards from being legitimated. The statute of Virginia did not follow nor adopt any of the European laws as to bastards, but enacted a new statute on the subject, to be construed and enforced by reference to the words used in the statute itself, untrammelled by the rules of the civil law. The courts of Virginia, both before and after the adoption of our statute, construed the statute of that state as having abrogated the exception of the civil law as to adulterine bastards. Stones v. Keeling, 5 Call (Va.) 143; Broune v. Turberville, 2 Call. (Va.) 391; Templeman v. Steptoe, 1 Munf. 339; Davis v. Rowe, 6 Rand. (Va.) 355; Garland v. Harrison, 8 Leigh, 368. When we adopted in this state the Virginia statute as to bastards, we adopted with the statute the construction placed upon it by the courts of Virginia, and at each re-enactment of the statute we acquiesced in the constructions up to that time placed upon the statute by the courts of Virginia, no construction having in the meantime been placed upon the statute by our own courts. Favorite v. Booker, 17 Ohio St. 548. As the exception as to adulterine bastards existed in the civil law and in the law of Scotland, and was omitted from the Virginia statute, it must be presumed and held that such omission was intended, and that it was the purpose of the Virginia legislature to wipe out the exception as to adulterine bastards, and to permit them to be legitimated the same as other bastards. When the legislature of this state adopted the Virginia statute, in 1805, it was familiar, not only with the Virginia statute, but also with the civil law, the law of Scotland, the common law of England, and the Code Napoleon; and the omission of the exception as to adulterine bastards was not in ignorance of those laws, but was with the purpose of wiping out the exception, and doing justice to the innocent offspring.

It is urged by counsel for plaintiff in error that, while the words of our statute are broad enough to include adulterine bastards, the general assembly could not have intended to include them, because to do so would be against public policy, would disturb the general law protecting the marriage relation, and lead to absurd consequences, and that married people should not be encouraged to forsake their marriage vows, and cohabit with others in anticipation of a future marriage with a view of making their offspring legitimate; and these considerations induced the decision in the case of Sams v. Sams, 85 Ky. 396. There can be no public policy in this state in conflict with a valid statute of the state. Public policy must always yield to a valid statute. The general assembly has the power to enact a law legitimating adulterine bastards, and there would be no absurdity in so doing. Neither would such a statute disturb the general law protecting the marriage relation, nor the law of crimes and misdemeanors, nor the law as to public morals. The subject of marriage and divorce, and the subject of adultery and fornication, and the subject of public morals, are all carefully provided for and protected by separate chapters and sections of our statutes; and, if the general assembly desired to prevent adulterine bastards from becoming legitimated, some provision to that effect would be found in some of the statutes. No such provision is found, but, on the contrary, § 4175, Rev. Stat., has been enacted, as follows: "When a man has by a woman one or more children, and afterwards intermarries with her, such issue, if acknowledged by him as his child or children, shall be deemed legitimate; and the issue of parents whose marriage is deemed null in law shall nevertheless be legitimate." The force and effect of this section begin after the sections as to marriage, divorce, adultery, fornication, and public morals have expended their force. After marriage and divorce, and after prosecutions for adultery and fornication, and to protect public morals, there are often adulterine bastards existing, whose parents have thereafter become legally married, and have recognized and acknowledged them as their children; and the purpose of our statute is to legitimate such children, and to permit them to inherit from the father as well as the mother. Thereby justice is done to the innocent offspring without in any manner impinging upon the laws as to the marriage relation or as to public morals. Those laws are allowed to have their full force and effect, and this statute as to bastards provides for a state of things existing after the other statutes have been fully executed. Neither would such a statute encourage married persons to forsake their marriage vows, and cohabit with others, in anticipation of a future marriage, with a view of thereby making their offspring legitimate. The adulterous connection is not had with a view to subsequent marriage and legitimating children, but with a view to present pleasure; and the ardent hope and desire usually exist that no offspring should result therefrom; and this section was enacted to enable parents, when all impediments to a legal marriage should be removed, to intermarry, and recognize and acknowledge their offspring, and thereby in a measure atone for the sins of the past, and do justice to their innocent and unfortunate children. Viewed in this light, the statute is a righteous enactment, while to visit the sins of the parents upon the innocent and helpless offspring would shock every sense of right and justice.

Again, it is clear that after the birth of an adulterine bastard, all obstacles being removed, parents may legally marry, and enjoy all the rights and privileges of marriage. They may inherit from each other under our statute, and to allow them to marry and enjoy all the fruits thereof, and deprive their offspring from inheriting from them, would seem rank injustice; and it cannot be presumed, without clear words to that effect, that the legislature intended such an unjust result. To so hold would be to reward the guilty parents and punish the innocent offspring. That our statute was intended for the benefit and protection of the innocent offspring, and not for their punishment on account of sins committed by their parents, is shown by the cases of Wright v. Lore, 12 Ohio St. 619; Morris v. Williams, 39 Ohio St. 554. If the purpose of our law is to punish the bastard children for the errors of the parents, to be consistent the children should be prevented from inheriting from the mother as well as the father after the marriage of the parents. It is said that the mother is always known, but the father is not. But when the father marries the mother, and recognizes and acknowledges the children as his own, he thereby makes himself known, and thereafter there is no more reason for denying inheritance to them from him than from the mother.

Again, the weight of authority in this country is in favor of the defendant in error. Carroll v. Carroll, 20 Tex. 731; Hawbecker v. Hawbecker, 43 Md. 516; Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 19 L. R. A. 40; Schouler, Dom. Rel. p. 226; Sutphin v. Cow, 1 Western Law Monthly, 346. Opposed to these authorities is the case of Sams v. Sams, 85 Ky. 396. That case is cited by Pingrey on the Law of Real Property, § 1143; by Ballard on the Law of Real Property, § 4175; Cope v. Cope, 137 U. S. 682-686, 34 L. ed. 832, 833; Latin Maxims and Phrases by John Trainer, 450; Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict. p. 118; The Law of Persons and Personal Property, by Dwight, 257. The only adjudged case is Sams v. Sams, 85 Ky. 396, and all the citations and references are to that case, and most of them refer to the case in language indicating a doubt as to its soundness.

Again, the language of the statute is too clear to require construction: "When a man has by a woman one or more children, and afterwards intermarries with her," etc. "A man" means any man, and "a woman" means any woman. There are no exceptions. If he is a man and she is a woman, no matter what their previous lives may have been, they come within the language of the statute, and, when legally married, and the former issue acknowledged by him as his child, such issue becomes thereby legitimated, even though it is an adulterine bastard. Take the case at bar. Mr. McNicoll was a man, Mrs. Reasoner was a woman. He had a child by her, and afterwards intermarried with her, and acknowledged the child as his child. The statute says that in such case the child shall be deemed legitimate. Nothing is said in the statute as to whether the parents could or could not legally marry at the time the child was begotten. The general assembly having attached no such condition, the courts can attach none, and to do so would be judicial legislation.

- *1. A certificate of stock of a corporation in the usual form is an assurance to the world that the person named is the owner of the number of shares of its capital stock stated therein, and that these shares will be transferred on the books of the company to one purchasing the same on a surrender of the certificate with a proper assignment; and one who purchases such certificate in the market, without knowledge of any fraud in its issue, is entitled to have it transferred to him on the books of the company, and if, on demand, such transfer is refused, may recover of the company its value at the time of the demand.
2. Where certificates of the stock of a company are required to be issued by the president and the secretary under the seal of the company, and no other mode is provided or can be used, and neither the secretary nor the president is prohibited from holding stock, and both, with its knowledge, do in fact hold stock, the fact that a certificate is issued in favor of the secretary is not, of itself, sufficient to put a party on inquiry as to whether the secretary is rightfully the owner of it.
3. By reason of what appears on the face of a certificate of stock, and the fact that, as a matter of general knowledge in the business world, such certificates of stock are extensively purchased as investments, with no other inquiry than as to the genuineness of the signatures of the officers to the certificates, and that such use of them adds to the value of the stock of a company, and is largely to its advantage, the company is charged with the duty of observing care in their issue, and of supervising their agents charged with the performance of the duty. This is a duty it owes to all persons dealing in its stock; and if, by reason of its negligence in this regard, spurious stock is issued, it is liable in damages to anyone purchasing it for value, without knowledge of its fraudulent character. And a failure of the party, under such circumstances, to inquire at the office of the company, is not such contributory negligence as will deprive him of the right to recover, although such inquiry would have disclosed the fraudulent character of the certificate.

ERROR to a General Term of the Superior Court of Cincinnati reversing a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to cancel shares of stock in the plaintiff corporation which were alleged to have been fraudulently issued by its secretary. Affirmed.

Statement by Minshall, J.:

At the time of his death, which occurred May 25, 1882, George F. Doughty was the secretary of the plaintiff in error, and had been such from the time of its incorporation in October, 1881. During this time he had fraudulently caused to be issued a large number of spurious certificates of the stock of the company, being shares in excess of its capital stock. These certificates were in the hands of various individuals, each of whom had either purchased what he held from Doughty, or taken it in pledge for money loaned him by the holder. Suits were brought by many of them against the company for the value of the stock, on its refusal to transfer the stock to them on the books of the company; and a judgment had been obtained in one case, and a verdict in another, when the suit below was commenced in the superior court, against all the individuals claiming to own such stock, asking that they be required to set up their claims to the stock held by them, and the certificates be delivered up and canceled. The defendants answered separately, each claiming that, whatever the character of certificates held by him, he was an innocent holder for value and entitled to recover of the company the value of his stock. Two set up former adjudications in their favor. The case was tried in special term on the issues. The court, at the request of the defendants, made a separate finding of the facts and the law, and rendered judgment in favor of the railway company. On error to the general term the judgment was reversed, and judgments rendered in favor of the defendants respectively. The finding of facts so far as material to the question here presented,—the right of the company to relief against innocent holders for value of the stock,—is as follows:

"First. That the plaintiff was incorporated under the laws of Ohio on October 8, 1881, with an authorized capital stock of $3,000, 000, divided into shares of $100 each, all of which shares were lawfully subscribed for by bona fide subscribers, paid in full in cash, and proper certificates therefor duly issued to such subscribers on or before October 12, 1881, which certificates were duly signed by Theodore Cook, as president, and by George F. Doughty, as the secretary, of the plaintiff, and were evidenced by the genuine seal of the plaintiff corporation. That Theodore Cook was elected and qualified as president of the plaintiff corporation at the date of its organization, and George F. Doughty was elected and qualified as secretary of the plaintiff corporation at the date of its organization, and that the said Theodore Cook and George F. Doughty were re-elected and qualified as president and secretary, respectively, of said corporation on the first Monday in January, 1882, and the said Theodore Cook continued to be president thereof until January, 1883, and the said George F. Doughty continued to be its secretary until his death on May 25, 1882. That the plaintiff's capital stock has never been increased by any express action of the directors or of the stockholders, as provided by the statutes of the state in that behalf. That upon its organization the plaintiff corporation adopted, among others, the following by-laws in reference to the issue of its certificates of stock, which continued in force until January, 1883. 'Art. 8. Certificates of stock shall be issued to each subscriber for the number of shares which he may own, under the corporate seal of the company, signed by the president and secretary, setting forth the amount due upon each share. Art. 9. It shall be the duty of the secretary to keep the office of the company open during business hours. He shall be the custodian of the seal of the company, and shall affix the same with his attestation thereto whenever the official business of the company may require. He shall attend all meetings of the stockholders, directors, and executive committee, unless excused, and keep and record a full and true minute of their proceedings. He shall also attend the meetings of any committee appointed by the directors or stockholders if requested, and keep a record of their proceedings. He shall keep the stock ledger of the company, and make transfers of stock upon the surrender, and properly indorse and cancel all stock certificates which may be presented for transfer. He shall give bond for $50,000, with two good securities, to be approved by the executive committee.'

"Second. All of the stock certificates of the plaintiff issued by it, and all the stock certificates of the plaintiff purporting to be issued by the plaintiff and held by the defendants, were in the same form, and were as follows, with the blanks for the number of 43 L. R. A.

shares and the party in whose favor they were issued filled in writing, to wit:

Form of Certificate.

This is to certify that— is entitled to— shares of one hundred dollars each in the capital stock of the Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Texas Pacific Railway Company, transferable only on the books of the company, in person or by attorney, on the surrender of this certificate. Witness the seal of the company and the signature of the president and secretary at Cincinnati this — day of — —, Secretary.
—, President.

[Corporate Seal.]

"That all of said certificates issued during the lifetime of George F. Doughty, were filled out and signed by George F. Doughty as secretary. They all bear the signature of Theodore Cook as president, with the exception of two, which were signed by John Scott, the vice president; and all bore the seal of plaintiff corporation, affixed by George F. Doughty, its secretary.

"Third. The certificates, before issue, were bound in two books called the 'Certificate Books,' with stubs, numbered from one to five hundred in the first and from five hundred to one thousand in the second. Each certificate bears the same number as its stub. The secretary, Doughty, was provided with a stock ledger and stock journal and register of transfers, and the books containing the blank certificates, regularly numbered, as above stated. There was no book designed to contain the actual transfer of the stock, but, instead of that, each certificate was indorsed with a blank form of assignment, to be filled out when assigned or surrendered, in form as follows:

For value received — sells to — the stock within mentioned, and authorize —, — attorney, to transfer the same on the books of the company.

Witness my hand and seal this — day of — A. D. 188—.

In presence of —.

"The register of transfers was a book containing a regularly ruled page with numbers on it to correspond with the numbers of certificates, and was arranged with reference to each, so as to permit the bookkeeper to show both the certificate from which and the one into which it was transferred. The stock ledger simply kept a ledger account with each stockholder and was posted from the stock journal in which the entries were journalized. The secretary's (Doughty's) mode of keeping the certificate books was to mark upon a stub of the new certificate the number of the certificate surrendered, in addition to the date, the names of the transferor and the transferee, and the number of shares. The stub had a place for the receipt of the transferee upon getting the new certificate.

"Fourth. The president, Theodore Cook, gave but little, if any, personal attention to transfers of stock, except to sign the certificates. After the issue of the certificates to the original subscribers to the capital stock of the plaintiff, the president was in the habit of signing a number of certificates in blank, and leaving them with Doughty, as secretary, to be filled out when necessary upon the presentation to said Doughty, as such secretary, of outstanding certificates for transfer duly indorsed as above provided, and for no other purpose. When the said Doughty died, there had been signed by the president and secretary, with the corporate seal affixed, and removed from the book, certificates for 34,000 shares of stock which had not been canceled or surrendered by them. The authorized stock was 30,000 shares.

"Fifth. Said George F. Doughty originally subscribed for 650 shares, and received therefor certificates Nos. 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, and 91. Of these Nos. 87, for 250 shares, and 88, for 50 shares, belonged to others, who paid the subscriptions therefor, and the certificates therefor, indorsed by Doughty, were at once delivered to them, and never again came into his possession. The certificates Nos. 89 for 50 shares, 90 for 100 shares, and 91 for 100 shares, were subscribed for by said Doughty on the equal joint account of himself and defendants Herman Klein & Son, and issued in the name of George F. Doughty. The subscription therefor was paid with funds borrowed on a pledge of said certificates 89, 90, and 91 and on October 8, 1881, by said Doughty and Herman Klein & Son, and such certificates were never afterwards in the possession of said Doughty and said Herman Klein & Son until the same were redeemed and returned to said Doughty on May 17, 1882. On November 9, 1881, Doughty issued certificates Nos. 255 and 256 to himself, and noted upon the register of transfers that they had been issued upon the surrender of certificate No. 86. No. 86 was then in the bank of Kuhn & Sons, and pledged as above stated. On May 20, 1882, the secretary, Doughty, delivered to Herman Klein & Son certificates Nos. 547 and 548, for 125 shares, but made no entry thereof on the books of the company. On May 5, 1882, Joseph Rawson & Sons purchased a note of George F. Doughty for $7,500, secured by 100 shares of plaintiff's stock, represented by certificate No. 86 which they continued to hold until November 27, 1882, and then sold the same in the market. Subsequently to Doughty's death, to wit, on September 6, 1882, Herman Klein & Son, surrendered to the company certificates Nos. 547 and 548, and Theodore Cook, as administrator of George F. Doughty, surrendered certificate No. 89, for 50 shares, and 75 from certificate No. 90, for 100 shares, and the company issued to Herman Klein & Son certificates Nos. 597 and 598, for 125 shares. Said Doughty afterwards became the owner of 50 shares on December 23, 1881, represented by certificate No. 373, which he sold and transferred to other parties than the defendants herein. He also became the owner, by purchase, of 25 shares on December 31, 1881, represented 43 L. R. A.

by certificate No. 434, which was found indorsed by George F. Doughty, in an envelope marked 'George F. Doughty,' in the safe of the company, and came to the possession of Theodore Cook; and the court find that said certificate was the private property of George F. Doughty, and that it came into the possession of Theodore Cook as his administrator, and was subsequently transferred by said Theodore Cook, as administrator, to other parties than the defendants named in this case. He also became the owner by purchase, on February 27, 1882, of 100 shares evidenced by certificate No. 466, which he subsequently sold and transferred to parties other than the defendants in this case; and on April, 1882, said Doughty purchased 1 share of capital stock, evidenced by certificate No. 513, which was neither found in the possession of said Doughty nor of said plaintiff at the time of his death. The above were all the shares which the court find that the evidence shows were ever held or owned by said George F. Doughty.

"Sixth. The court further find the personal account of George F. Doughty in the stock ledger at the death of George F. Doughty was as follows:

"Dr. George F. Doughty, 1881, Oct. 15. To Meyer Bettman, 4, $5,000. Dec. 8. Sundry parties, 10, $1,000.

"Cr. 1881. Oct. 8. By Capital stock, 3, $60,000. Oct. 8. By capital stock, 3, $5,000. Nov. 11. By L. Markbreit, 7, $1,000. Dec. 23. By Simon & Huseman, 10, $5,000.

"But that the account, as shown by comparison with the stock-certificate books and the register of transfers, was neither complete nor correct. And the court find that the stock-certificate books and the register of transfers contain the only entries of the issue of fraudulent certificates by said George F. Doughty. That the entries upon the stock-certificate books and the register of transfers disclose from November 9, 1881, down to the death of said George F. Doughty, entry after entry that was suspicious upon its face, and was fraudulent in fact, and that very little investigation of these books would have disclosed the fraud which Doughty was engaged in perpetrating in issuing stock certificates hereinafter referred to, and found to be spurious by the court; and that the directors and president of the plaintiff company were negligent in the examination and supervision of the said certificate books and register of transfers, and of the certificates from time to time surrendered and in the possession of said company for cancellation, and of the use being made by said Doughty of certificates signed in blank, and that such negligence enabled said Doughty to commit the frauds hereinafter returned." To the latter part of which finding plaintiff excepted.

The seventh, to and including the eighteenth, findings are on the special facts of the case of each defendant, and are in general as summarized by the judge in delivering the opinion in general term: "That George F. Doughty, disregarding his duty in the premises and without the knowledge of the plaintiff or any of its officers other than himself, falsely and fraudulently filed up the certificates in his own favor that had been signed in blank by the president, and either falsely and fraudulently entered upon the books of the company that the certificate had been issued, or falsely and fraudulently made no entry of the certificate upon the books of said company. That the said George F. Doughty made and executed his promissory notes, and sold the notes through a banker, with the certificates properly indorsed by the said George F. Doughty for transfer. That the defendants bought said notes relying upon the representations in said certificates contained, and made no inquiry in respect to the validity of said certificates, or the issue thereof, of any officer of the company; and that no defendant had any knowledge of the issue of any notes or certificates by said Doughty, or in his favor, other than the notes and certificates bought by him. It also appears in these findings that, although the fraudulent certificates bore dates ranging from November, 1881, to May, 1882, yet no one of the defendants made his or her loan prior to February 18, 1882, and some of them as late as May 20, 1882." The nineteenth finding is as follows: "Nineteenth. The court further find that each of the above-named parties defendant are holders and owners, respectively, of said promissory notes; that they purchased the same in the ordinary course of business, without any actual knowledge of any fraud or irregularity of said Doughty in respect to or in the issue of, said certificates of stock, and relying upon them as genuine and valid security for the money advanced by them in the purchase of said notes; that each of said parties knew that the said George F. Doughty was the secretary of the said company; and that none of said parties made any inquiry of any of the officers, agents, or stockholders of said company in respect to said certificates of stock, or the issue thereof, before purchasing notes except as hereinafter stated. And the court find that, if any of the parties defendant, in the purchase of the foregoing notes, had made inquiry as to the genuineness of the certificates pledged to secure any one of said notes, such inquiry would have disclosed the fraudulent character of such certificates; to which conclusions each of the defendants severally except. The court further find that each of the said parties defendant presented his aforesaid certificates to the plaintiff corporation, and made demand for the transfer of the same at the dates alleged in their several answers and cross petitions, and that the plaintiff refused to make such transfers. The court further find that each of said parties defendant thereupon commenced an action in the superior court of Cincinnati, and in the court of common pleas of Hamilton county, as alleged by them in their several answers and cross petitions, and that the plaintiff filed its answers as therein set forth, and that several actions are still pending in said courts."

The court also found the market value of the stock at the time the demand 43 L. R. A.

for its transfer was made, and also made a finding designating the stock it found to be genuine and that which it found to be spurious. Its conclusions of law may be stated generally as follows: (1) That the presence of the name of Doughty—both as secretary and as owner—on each of the spurious certificates put the party in acquiring it on inquiry, and that a failure to inquire of some officer of the company other than Doughty was contributory negligence, depriving him of the right to recover. (2) That the signing of the spurious certificates by Doughty was not the act of the company, and imposed no obligation on it to recognize the holder as a stockholder. (3) that the plaintiff is entitled to have the spurious certificates delivered up and canceled. The plea of res judicata set up by two of the defendants was sustained. In general term, the finding "that if any of the parties defendant, in the purchase of the foregoing notes, had made inquiry as to the genuineness of the certificate pledged to secure any of said notes, such inquiry would have disclosed the fraudulent character of such certificate," was set aside as not sustained by the evidence.

Messrs. Harmon, Colston, Goldsmith, & Hoody and Ramsey, Marwell, & Ramsey, for plaintiff in error:

In view of the fact that stock certificates are not negotiable (Hammond v. Hastings, 134 U. S. 404, 33 L. ed. 962), and of the fact that even bona fide purchasers for value must therefore necessarily take instruments of that nature subject to all defenses (Second Nat. Bank v. Walbridge, 19 Ohio St. 419, 2 Am. Rep. 408), surely it is going far enough to hold that a corporation is estopped by the statements in a certificate actually issued by it in the regular course of business, when there is nothing to suggest any question of its possibly fraudulent character.

When on the very face of the paper a case was shown where Doughty's interest and his duty conflicted, what reason can be given why the well-known rule should not apply that persons dealing with him in the line of his interest should take the risk of his having violated his duty?

The person with specific knowledge before him, and free choice to act or refrain, should take whatever risk there may be.

The act of alleged agency was either an act for which the principal is liable according to the rules of law applicable to the subject, or it was not such an act. This question being determined, the subject is disposed of. And yet, before this maxim can be applied, that question must be settled. Hence, the maxim cannot aid in its settlement.

Applying the principles settled by cases involving the wrongful issue by agents of bills of lading and receipts for goods not in possession, it becomes clear that it is not within the apparent scope of the employment of the secretary of a railroad company to issue, in his own name and for his own purposes, stock certificates where the total authorized capital stock has been issued, where no certificates have been returned, and where the by-laws expressly provide that the power to issue certificates can only be exercised upon the return of prior certificates.

The issuing of a certificate of stock, signed by the president and secretary of the plaintiff in error, and under its corporate seal, is the corporate act of the company, and not the act of the president and secretary as the mere agents of the corporation. Such a certificate, to all intents and purposes, is the certificate of the defendant corporation in its corporate capacity.

The stock certificate is an instrument of evidence, recognized by the law, of ownership of its stock, created and issued by the corporation in the exercise of its franchise, and in the interest of the whole body of its stockholders, to enable its shares to be freely dealt in by the public.

The corporation is estopped to deny as against a bona fide purchaser for value the validity of such a certificate if it was not an overissue; and if an overissue, it is estopped to deny that the issue was a corporate act, and is responsible for the loss sustained by such a bona fide purchaser for value.

The negligence of the corporation in intrusting Doughty, as its secretary, with certificates signed in blank by the president, and with the corporate seal, and in failing to make any examination of the certificates in the certificate books, or other books showing the issuing of stock, and of the certificates surrendered from time to time to such secretary, in lieu of the certificates so signed in blank and left in his possession, or otherwise to investigate the use made of certificates, so signed in blank, continued almost daily for a period of seven months, until it constituted a course of business, whereby the directors are chargeable with knowledge of all the facts included in this course of business, renders the corporation liable for the injury occasioned by such neglect, to the same extent that it would be if its board of directors knew and approved of all the acts of Doughty.

When a corporation issues a certificate of stock it is delivering the intangible property, as distinguished from a mere symbol, to the person in whose favor it is issued, with the object of enabling him to sell it to third parties.

If the certificate contains the representation that it is fully paid-up stock, it is binding and conclusive both against the corporation and its creditors.

Minshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Independently of any question of negligence in the issue on the part of the company or its agents, it would seem on the plainest principles that the company should be held liable to an innocent holder for value of any part of the stock issued by its secretary. The certificates were all signed by the president and the secretary, and had the corporate seal attached, as required by law and the rules of the company. If stock so issued is not to be regarded as issued by the act of the company, it is difficult to understand what would constitute an act of the company done in its corporate capacity. It is as much the act of the company as is the deed of a natural person, signed, sealed, and delivered by himself. This is so, or a corporation can do no act which can be regarded as done by itself. A corporation is a mere fiction created by law and must, therefore, act through some human agency, or it cannot act at all. These agencies necessarily differ in character. Many simply represent it as agents, others represent it as a corporation in what they do, and their acts are its acts as much so as the acts of an individual done by himself in his own behalf. This is so as to all acts appointed by the law and its own rules to be done by a particular agent or agents, and can be done by no other officer or agent of the company, as is the case in the issue and transfer of stock. In Bank of Kentucky v. Schuykill Bank, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 180, where the liability of a corporation for the acts of what is well termed its "statute agents" is considered, the court says (p. 240): "Although a bank corporation is compelled, by the incorporeal nature of its essence, to act by others, yet, when these are part of its organic machinery, like its cashier, it is as much responsible for their omissions and commissions as is a natural person who employs assistants in the execution of any commission." And it was there held that the Bank of Kentucky was liable to the holders of its stock that had been fraudulently transferred by its transfer agent the Schuylkill Bank, situated in Philadelphia; and the latter bank was held liable to the Kentucky Bank for the frauds of its cashier to whom it had intrusted the service it had undertaken as the transfer agent of the Bank of Kentucky. It is required by the statute, and, in this case, by the by-laws of the company, that all certificates of stock should be issued by the president and secretary of the company, attested by its own seal. Stock certificates can be issued in no other way, and by no other agencies of the company. Rev. Stat. § 3254, and rule 10 of the by-laws of the company. In the absence of any knowledge of fraud in its issue, we know of no rule of diligence that requires one in purchasing such stock to inquire beyond the genuineness of the certificate on its face. If the signatures of the president and the secretary are genuine, and the seal has been affixed and the paper on its face is a certificate of stock, to require one without knowledge of any fraud in its issue, before purchasing it, to inquire of the company or any of its officers as to whether it is genuine would be to require a degree of care not exacted in any other similar business transaction, and not observed by the most careful business men in dealing in the stock of a company. And hence the omission to make such inquiry is not such negligence as to deprive the holder of stock innocently acquired of his remedy against the company on a refusal to transfer it as promised in the certificate. The fact that the certificate appears on its face to have been issued to the secretary as the owner of it cannot be regarded as a suspicious circumstance where, as in this case, he was not forbidden to hold stock, and, as found, 650 valid shares had been issued to him. Western Maryland R. Co. v. Franklin Bank, 60 Md. 36; Titus v. Great Western Turnp. Co. 61 N. Y. 237. As the secretary had the right to hold stock and did hold it, and as but one mode is provided by statute and the rules of the company for the issue of stock certificates, the fact that a certificate is issued in his favor cannot, of itself, be adjudged a circumstance calculated to place an ordinarily prudent man on inquiry. This is shown by the fact that it did not excite inquiry in the minds of any of the numerous persons who became the owners of such stock, men accustomed to such business, and including some of the most careful business men of Cincinnati. Protection against the possibility of such frauds is provided in the requirement that the certificate shall be signed by the president as well as the secretary. Either, by this requirement, must be deemed a sufficient check on the dishonesty of the other, where the company itself has provided no other check. Where, then, one of the officers becomes negligent, or conspires with the other to commit a fraud on the company by the issue of spurious stock, which comes into the possession of an innocent holder for value, who should more reasonably suffer the loss than the company, who selected its president and secretary, and thus placed it in the power of one or both to practice the fraud? The law has always been careful to protect the rights of the innocent third person under such circumstances. When one, by the fraud of another, is induced to make and deliver him a deed, who then sells and conveys the land to an innocent purchaser for value, the latter is protected against the fraud that had been practised by his grantor in acquiring the land, for the reason that, having no knowledge of the fraud, he had the right to rely on the deed held by his grantor. This is the doctrine of innocent purchaser for value, and is of very general application. It rests upon the principle that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the wrongful act of another, he must bear the loss that placed it in the power of such person to do the wrong. This is but the application of a principle sanctioned by time and the dictates of natural justice. Thus, in Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R. 70, it is said: "Wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it." The same principle is expressed in another form by Lord Holt in Hern v. Nichols, 1 Salk. 289, who there says: "For, seeing somebody must be a loser by this deceit, it is more reason that he that employs and puts a trust and confidence in the deceiver should be a loser than a stranger." The principle has recently been applied in two cases in this court: Schurtz v. Colvin, 55 Ohio St. 274; and Stranahan Bros. Catering Co. v. Coit, 55 Ohio St. 398.

So far we have considered the liability of the company to innocent parties as resting simply on the ground that the issue of the fraudulent certificates was an act done by the company in its corporate capacity, and affecting it, irrespective of any question of care, in the same manner that any similar act done by a natural person would affect him, whether done by agent or not. But there is another element in this case, presented by the finding of facts, on which the cross petitioners rely as fixing the liability of the company to them, and that is the negligence of the company and its agents in regard to the issue of these spurious certificates by its secretary. The facts in regard to this are set forth in the fourth and sixth findings contained in the statement of the case. From these findings it appears that the president signed from time to time a large number of certificates in blank, and intrusted them to the secretary, who fraudulently filled them up in his own favor, and obtained loans upon them by pledging them as security; that the president gave little, if any, personal attention to the transfer of stock; that from November 9, 1881, the books of the company showed entry after entry that was suspicious on its face, and that very little investigation of these books would have disclosed the fraud being practised by Doughty; and the court then expressly finds that the directors and president "were negligent in the examination and supervision of the certificate books and register of transfers, and the certificates from time to time surrendered and in possession of the company for cancellation and of the use being made by Doughty of certificates signed in blank, and that such negligence enabled Doughty to commit the frauds" before referred to. The general rule is that a corporation, like a natural person, is liable for the negligence of its agents causing injury to others, where the act done is within the scope of their agency, whether the act be one of omission or commission. Story, Agency, § 452; Tome v. Parkersburg Branch R. Co. 39 Md. 36, 17 Am. Rep. 540; Western Maryland R. Co. v. Franklin Bank, 60 Md. 36, 42. But in answer to the claim of liability on the ground of negligence the company asserts that there is no privity between it and third persons who may deal in its stock; that a certificate of stock is not negotiable; and therefore that neither the company nor any of its agents were under any legal obligation in favor of persons dealing in its stock to supervise the acts of its president and secretary in issuing or in transferring stock. It is not necessary to determine whether a certificate of stock is a negotiable instrument, like a promissory note or bill of exchange. It is not a promise to pay money, and it has no period of maturity as such instruments have; yet, as has been said, it is much like negotiable instruments. On its face, a certificate of stock is an evidence of the title of the person named in it to a certain number of shares, with an assurance to all persons that it will be transferred on the books of the company to anyone purchasing it, on surrendering the certificate. In First Nat. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. 377, 20 L. ed. 174, it is said: "Although neither in form nor character negotiable paper, they [certificates of stock] approximate to it as nearly as practicable. . . . It is easy to see why investments of this character are sought after and relied upon. No better form could be adopted to assure the purchaser that he can buy with safety. He is told, under the seal of the corporation, that the shareholder is entitled to so much stock, which can be transferred on the books of the corporation, in person or by attorney, when the certificates are surrendered, but not otherwise. This is a notification to all persons interested to know that whoever in good faith buys the stock, and produces to the corporation the certificates, regularly assigned, with power to transfer, is entitled to have the stock transferred to him." Re Bahia & S. F. R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. 584, is to the same effect; and it is there shown that the power of giving certificates is for the benefit of the company in general, as the effect of it is to make the shares of greater value. It is said in Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 416: "To such an extent has the law of estoppel been applied to protect a bona fide purchaser of stock that he is protected now in almost every instance where he would be protected if he were purchasing a promissory note or other negotiable instrument." The cases and authorities certainly show that the claim of the company that there is no duty (for that is all that can be meant by the use of the term "privity") resting upon it or its agents towards third persons to observe care in the issue and transfer of its certificates of stock, and that, as a consequence, it is not liable to them for negligence in such matters, is not well founded. From the character of the certificate it must be held to contemplate and know that persons relying upon it will purchase the certificate in the market, and meet with loss should the person named in it not be the lawful owner of it. It must therefore be held to care in regard to this, and answer for any loss the result of its negligence, or of its agents.

There has been an effort to liken a certificate of stock to a bill of lading and a warehouse receipt, and to apply the rule as to liability that seems to obtain in those cases. The principal case cited is that of Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B. 685, where it was held that "the master of a ship signing a bill of lading for goods which have never been shipped is not to be considered as the agent of the owner in that behalf, so as to make the latter responsible to one who has made advances upon the faith of bills of lading so signed." This case, with many others like it, is placed upon the distinction that a bill of lading is simply a contract of carriage, and while it may be used as a symbol of property, it makes no representation to third persons, which they have a right to rely on, that the fact is as stated in the bill. In this there is a broad distinction between a bill of lading and a certificate of stock; the latter, as already shown, being an assurance to the world that the person named in it is the owner of stock in the company, and that it will be transferred on the books of the company to a purchaser on a surrender of the certificate. No case is cited in which the rule of this class of cases has been applied to certificates of stock. It has not been applied in England, where the case of Grant v. Norway was decided, as appears from Re Bahia & S. F. R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. 584. It was there held that a certificate of stock amounts to a statement intended by the company to be acted on by purchasers of shares in the market, that the person named in it is entitled to shares, and that the company is liable to one who in good faith acts upon it, though the certificate was void as between the company and the person named in it as owner. The case of Grant v. Norway, in its limited application, has not met with universal approval. Bank of Batavia v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 195, 60 Am. Rep. 440. In Mechem, Agency, § 717, it is said, in commenting on the New York cases: "A different result has in some cases been reached upon the same state of facts, but the doctrine of the New York court seems most consonant with reason and justice." Among the cases so referred to he includes the case of Grant v. Norway. It is certainly much modified by the decisions of this court in Ensel v. Levy, 46 Ohio St. 255, where the maker of a warehouse receipt was held estopped from setting up a claim against a bona fide purchaser, inconsistent with a statement in the receipt that the property would be delivered on compliance with the conditions named therein.

There are many cases decided by courts of last resort of the highest character that either directly or in principle sustain a recovery, in a case like this, on the part of an innocent purchaser for value of a certificate of stock, on the refusal of the company to transfer the stock on its books to him. Every distinction does not constitute a difference, for, as frequently observed by Lord Mansfield, the law does not consist in decided cases, but of general principles that run through them, and by which they have been decided. If it were different, the use of cases in applying the law would be of little help to the lawyer or judge. Cases are principally useful as tokens of what the law is in its generality. They bend to the principle, and not the principle to them. Therefore a difference in facts that does not amount to a difference in law must be disregarded in applying the rule of a case. These observations are made because counsel, in commenting upon many of the cases relative to the subject, seem to have seized upon the slightest difference in facts as calling for the application of a different rule. Some of the cases to which we refer as governing this one are as follows: Western Maryland R. Co. v. Franklin Bank, 60 Md. 36; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Bank of Kentucky v. Schuylkill Bank, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 180, Affirmed on appeal by the supreme court; Hackensack Water Co. v. De Kay, 36 N. J. Eq. 548; Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall. 604, 19 L. ed. 1008; People's Bank v. Kurtz, 99 Pa. 344, 44 Am. Rep. 112; Titus v. Great Western Turnp. Co. 61 N. Y. 237; Bruff v. Mali, 36 N. Y. 200; McNeil v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, 7 Am. Rep. 341; Moore v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, 55 N. Y. 41, 14 Am. Rep. 173; Holbrook v. West Jersey Zinc Co. 57 N. Y. 616; Bridgeport Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 30 Conn. 231; Tome v. Parkersburg Branch R. Co. 39 Md. 36, 17 Am. Rep. 540; Willis v. Fry, 13 Phila. 33; First Nat. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. 369, 20 L. ed. 172; Allen v. South Boston R. Co. 150 Mass. 200, 5 L. R. A. 716; Jarvis v. Manhattan Beach Co. 148 N. Y. 652, 31 L. R. A. 776; Fifth Avenue Bank v. Forty-Second Street & G. Street Ferry R. Co. 137 N. Y. 231, 19 L. R. A. 331. Two of the cases above cited—Bank of Kentucky v. Schuylkill Bank and New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler—may be regarded as of the same family with this case. They both grew out of large overissues of stock by a transfer agent of the respective companies. The large sums involved secured the employment of the ablest of counsel, who seem to have exhausted every resource of skill and ingenuity in making a defense for the companies against the claims of innocent holders of the spurious certificates. Most, if not all, of the arguments advanced in subsequent cases, and now urged in this case, were there pressed upon the attention of the courts. But in each case, after the fullest consideration, and in opinions of unusual ability, they were rejected, and judgment given for the holders of the stock. In Bank of Kentucky v. Schuylkill Bank it was, however, directly for the plaintiff, the suit being for indemnity against its transfer agent, the Schuylkill Bank.

The principle on which the decisions have generally gone is the liability of a corporation for the acts of its agents done within the scope of the agency conferred on them. There has been some controversy as to what is meant by "the scope of the agency" but it seems now well settled that an act, though wilfully, fraudulently, or negligently done by an agent, is within the scope of his agency, and charges the principal as to innocent third persons, where the acts done—the making of a contract, the disposition of property, the transfer of stock, and the issuing of certificates therefor—are within the powers conferred on him as an agent. The language of the court in Bridgeport Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 30 Conn. 231, is applicable here: "It is said that Schuyler was the agent of the defendants only to do rightful acts, and when he did wrongful acts he ceased to be their agent. If he committed the wrongful acts in the course of his employment, if the doing of like acts was within the scope of his employment, then he was their agent throughout, so far as third parties were concerned. If this convenient doctrine is sound, when can a principal be held liable for the wrongful act of his agent? No man appoints an agent to do a wrong, and if the moment an agent transcends his authority his relation to his principal ceases, when can a principal be held for a wrongful act? And yet it is well settled that he can be so held." See also Mechem, Agency, § 739; Story, Agency, § 652; Beach, Priv. Corp. § 488; Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Blakesley, 42 Ohio St. 645, 652. In some of the cases importance has been attached to the negligence of the company, through its proper agents, in not supervising the conduct of its business, and whereby the particular agent has been enabled to perpetrate his frauds. But I apprehend that, upon an accurate analysis of the company's liability in such a case, it will be found to rest on its liability, for the acts of the agent who perpetrated the fraud. If the extent of his agency included the legitimate doing of an act of the kind done, then it will be liable though the act done was a fraud as to it and other persons. As to an innocent third person, affected by the agent's wrongful act, the negligence of the company in not discovering or preventing the fraud may accentuate his right of recovery, but does not, as I apprehend, add to nor create that right.

The plaintiff in error relies much upon the case of Moore v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 111 U. S. 156, 28 L. ed. 385. We think it sufficient to distinguish that case from this that the court there found that the plaintiff made the cashier of the bank, who committed the fraud, her agent to procure and have transferred to her the stock on which she proposed to loan him the money, and that in doing so he acted for her, and not the bank; and therefore that she, and not the bank, was responsible for his wrongful act in filling up the certificate in fraud of the bank as well as of the plaintiff. If the court was right in its assumption as to the fact of agency, then the decision can have no application to this case, because there is no such feature in it. In the facts as found there is no suggestion that any of the defendants employed Doughty to procure stock for them. If the court was wrong in its opinion as to the facts, then all that can be said of its decision is that it was upon a misconceived state of facts, and cannot apply here, although, as a matter of fact, the two cases should be found to be substantially alike in their facts. In the course of his opinion, the judge delivering it referred to a number of cases similar to this one, without any expression of disapproval, and placed the decision on the ground just stated. It may be further observed that the case does not seem to be in harmony with Allen v. South Boston R. Co. 150 Mass. 200, 5 L. R. A. 716, where, on a state of facts quite similar the court held the treasurer who committed the frauds to be the agent of the company, and not of the party purchasing the stock. The case of Clafin v. Farmers' & C. Bank, 25 N. Y. 293, has been cited as sustaining the contention of the railway company. But this case was distinguished from a case like the present one by the court delivering the opinion, as well as by the same court in the later case of Titus v. Great Western Turnp. Co. 61 N. Y. 243. In the former case the president of a bank, having a general authority to certify checks upon it as good, certified one in his own favor. This the court held was out of the ordinary course of business, and contrary to business and legal rules, and not within the scope of the agency, but was particular to distinguish it from the issuing or transfer of a certificate of stock. The recent case of Knox v. Eden Musee Americain Co. 148 N. Y. 441, 31 L. R. A. 779, needs to be noticed. In that case it will be observed that Jurgens, the wrongdoer, was not the agent of the company to issue or transfer stock. His employment was simply to cancel surrendered stock. Surrendered certificates were by him abstracted from the safe of the company, and pledged as security for a loan. With respect to this the court said: "If it can be said that the direction of the president to Jurgens to cancel the certificates made him the agent of the company for that purpose, it was an authority to destroy, and not use. His act in abstracting them from the safe and uttering them as valid certificates had no relation to the authority conferred. It was not an act of the same kind as that which he was authorized to perform. He had no apparent authority to issue them as genuine certificates, because he had no authority to issue certificates for any purpose." This broadly distinguishes the case from the one before us. No disposition is shown to modify the doctrine of the same court as announced in many previous cases as to the liability of a corporation for the acts of its agents done within the scope of their employment, although not only negligently, but even fraudulently done, and contrary to the purpose and instructions of the company. This clearly appears from the decision in Jarvis v. Manhattan Beach Co. 148 N. Y. 652, 31 L. R. A. 776, decided at the same term. The case draws the distinction between negotiable instruments and certificates of stock. The former, though lost or stolen, are available in the hands of an innocent purchaser for 43 L. R. A.

value, whereas the latter are not; and the court treated the certificate abstracted by Jurgens as stolen from the company. The fact that the court in general term, on setting aside the finding made in special term that inquiry at the office of the company would have disclosed the fraudulent character of the stock in question, proceeded to render the judgment the special term should have rendered instead of remanding the case for a new trial, was not error, for the reason that the finding was immaterial, as such care was not required under the circumstances; and its omission was not contributory negligence on the part of the defendants, or any of them, depriving them of a right to recover. If the statements contained in a certificate of stock made by a company cannot be relied on by a purchaser in the market without further inquiry, it may well be asked, What real purpose does the certificate subserve? The language used by the court in Bridgeport Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 30 Conn. 247, is pertinent to the question: "To require those who acted on the certificate to ascertain, at their peril, from the books of the company, subject to the possibility of false entries by officers of the company in those books, whether the certificates were correct, is repugnant to the face of the certificate, to the purpose of it, and to the duties committed to the officers of the company. It would defeat the transferability of the stock." And, as observed in Willis v. Fry, 13 Phila. 40: "Such an investigation is obviously superfluous where the officers of the corporation have done their duty, and will generally be unavailing when they are engaged in the perpetration of a fraud." And, in Lowry v. Commercial & F. Bank, Taney, 310, 329, where it was held that purchasers of stock are not bound beyond the certificate, or to examine the books of the corporation, to ascertain the validity of the transfer, Taney, Ch. J., said: "A different rule would render the right of every purchaser of stock in a bank insecure or liable to doubt, and greatly impair its value, and would, moreover, seriously disturb the usages of trade, and the established order of business in relation to this subject, in a manner highly injurious to the community; for purchasers always rely on the certificate of the bank in which it is held as conclusive evidence of the ownership." See also New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30, 71. The case of Separate School Dist. Bd. of Edu. v. Sinton, 41 Ohio St. 504, does not require a different rule of diligence. There the court found from the character of the act under which the bonds were issued that they might be redeemed before due, and for this reason held that Sinton should have inquired of the board before taking the bonds of the treasurer as security for a loan. The bonds had in fact been redeemed, and placed in the hands of the treasurer for cancellation, and inquiry of the board would have disclosed that fact. These particular bonds were regarded as not negotiable. We may add that the finding of fact set aside is, more properly, a conclusion of law, and, as such, is not warranted by the findings made in the case. As the company did not discover the frauds until after the death of Doughty, it is difficult to see how an inquiry at the office of the company would have disclosed anything as to the fraudulent character of the certificates in question, but the authorities show, and reason suggests, that there is no such rule of diligence required of those who, in the market, for value, and in good faith, purchase certificates of stock that are genuine on their face. Judgment affirmed.

Shauck, J., dissenting:

The failure of Doughty's victims to make the investigation required of them by familiar rules of the law enabled him to perpetrate many frauds of much magnitude. Before the bringing of this suit by the company, numerous actions were brought against it by some of those who had loaned him money upon his notes, and accepted as security his own false representations touching his ownership of stock. In those cases and in this the superior court of Cincinnati and the circuit court of Hamilton county have denied the company's liability for Doughty's frauds, vindicating that conclusion in opinions of much research and accurate discrimination. Force, J., in Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 11 Ohio L. J. 86; Taft, J., in this case, 24 Ohio L. J. 198; Peck, J., same case, 22 Ohio L. J. 248, and Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Third Nat. Bank, 1 Ohio C. C. 199. The same conclusion has been reached by the supreme court of the United States in a case not distinguishable from this by any fact of legal import, and by a court of equal authority in England. Moores v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 111 U. S. 156, 28 L. ed. 385; British Mut. Bkg. Co. v. Charnwood Forest R. Co. L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 714. For extended discussion of the principles involved and analysis of the cases cited in the opinion of the majority, these references are deemed sufficient. Attention to the precise case before us will make apparent the irrelevancy of the cases, and the inconclusiveness of the reasoning upon which the recovery is sustained. These certificates of stock are spurious. The full amount of stock which the company might lawfully issue had been issued. The company was therefore without authority to transfer the shares which Doughty thus falsely claimed to own, and his pledgees have no demand against it for any failure of duty in that regard. The precise nature of the demand appears very clearly in the record. There was no transaction between the pledgees and the company. The demand is that, because Doughty was secretary and agent of the company, it shall answer to them for frauds perpetrated in transactions in which he borrowed money for his own use, upon his own notes, transferring false certificates, which bore upon their face conclusive notice that he had exercised his authority as agent for his own advantage, and adversely to the interest of his principal. The company derived no benefit from the transactions, and did not ratify them. Really, do the elementary principles of the law leave any occasion to doubt that in such a case a recovery should be denied? The case affords no place for the rule that when one of two innocent persons must suffer loss from the act of a third, it must be borne by him who enabled such third person to inflict it. The rule was not intended to penalize the ownership of property. Its terms presuppose two innocent persons. Can it be said that the defendants innocently disregarded the notice brought home to them that the agent was exercising his authority adversely to the interests of his principal? Unless the logical consequences of this recovery shall be averted by arbitrary exceptions, but little can remain of the familiar and salutary rules of law, founded on morals, and contrived to render fraud ineffectual, and prevent the divestiture of title by crime. Why may it not be said to every one who seeks to recover his stolen chattel from the vendee of the thief that he must fail because his ownership of the chattel enabled the thief to commit the wrong? No conclusive answer to that question can be given except by a court of last resort. In Moores v. Citizens' Nat. Bank the Supreme Court of the United States denied the liability of a corporation for the fraud of its issuing officer where he issued the stock directly to his pledgee with the false representation that it was a transfer of stock which he owned: while here the officer issued the stock to himself, and indorsed it to his pledgees. The cases do not otherwise differ. To say that the defense is cut off by the assignment of the certificates is to affirm that they have an attribute of negotiability. But the view that they are negotiable is disclaimed by the majority, and by counsel for the defendants. For obvious reasons, it could not be maintained. The attempt to distinguish the cases has therefore failed.

The pardoning power of the governor extends to cases of contempt.

(January 14, 1899.)

A PPEAL by the sheriff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County releasing a relator from custody to which he had been committed for contempt of court.
Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robert Vaughn and J. A. Pitts for appellant.

Messrs. Steger, Washington, & Jackson and Estes & Estes for appellee.

McAlister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This record presents the single question of the right of the governor to exercise the pardoning power in respect of fines imposed for contempt of court. It appears from the record that one W. A. Cason was under indictment in the criminal court of Davidson county for making false and fraudulent entries in the books of his employers. When the jury was being summoned by an officer of the court for the trial of W. A. Cason, his father, J. D. Cason, sought to have certain individuals, whose names were handed the officer, summoned. This misconduct on the part of J. D. Cason was reported to the judge, who, upon investigation of the facts, adjudged the contemner guilty of an attempt to pack the jury, and fined him $50, and sentenced him to jail for a period of ten days. It appears that the court suspended its judgment in the case from June 20 until July 9, 1898. On the 8th day of July, 1898, the governor pardoned the said J. D. Cason of said offense. The judge of the criminal court, conceiving that the pardoning power of the executive did not extend to cases of contempt, refused to recognize the pardon, and ordered the prisoner into custody. Thereupon the prisoner, through his counsel, applied to the circuit court for the writ of habeas corpus. Upon an investigation of the case the circuit judge was of opinion that the prisoner was entitled to his liberty, and he was accordingly discharged. The sheriff appealed, and has assigned as error the action of the circuit court in discharging the prisoner.

The precise question here presented was adjudged by this court at its December term, 1893, in the case of Garrett v. State, in which it was held that the pardoning power of the governor does extend to cases of contempt. A similar ruling had been made by our predecessors in the case of McCarty v. State. Article 3, § 1, of the Constitution provides that "the supreme executive power of the state shall be vested in a governor." Section 6 provides, viz.: "He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons after conviction, except in cases of impeachment." It will be observed that the only exception to the power conferred upon the governor to grant reprieves and pardons is in cases of impeachment, and the only limitation imposed is that the power cannot be exercised until after conviction. A judgment imposing a fine for contempt is a conviction, within the meaning of the Constitution. Sinnot v. State, 11 Lea, 281; Bryns v. Woodward, 10 Lea, 444; New Orleans v. New York Mail & S. S. Co. 20 Wall. 387-392, 22 L. ed. 354-357; Fischer v. Hayes, 6 Fed. Rep. 64; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 796. Contempts of court are public offenses, and pardonable as such. 1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 913, subsec. 2; 1 McClain, Crim. L. § 9; Ex parte Hickey, 43 L. R. A.

4 Smedes & M. 751; State, Van Orden, v. Sauvinet, 24 La. Ann. 119, 13 Am. Rep. 115; Re Mullee, 7 Blatchf. 23; Bates's Case, 55 N. H. 325; State v. Matthews, 37 N. H. 450; Re Sims, 54 Kan. 1, 25 L. R. A. 110; Re Manning, 44 Fed. Rep. 275. In the case of State, Van Orden, v. Sauvinet, 24 La. Ann. 119, 13 Am. Rep. 115, Judge Taliaferro said: "There being no exception found in our state Constitution precluding in such cases the exercise of the pardoning prerogative by the governor of the state, we feel no hesitancy in recognizing its existence. That the offense arising from a contempt of the authority of a court is one which, from its nature, should be summarily punished, to the end that an efficient and wholesome exercise of judicial powers may be had, no one will question. . . . A contempt of court is an offense against the state, and not an offense against the judge personally. In such a case the state is the offended party, and it belongs to the state, acting through another department of its government, to pardon or not to pardon, at its discretion, the offender." Again, in Ex parte Hickey, 4 Smedes & M. 751, the court said, viz.: "The whole doctrine of contempts goes to the point that the offense is a wrong to the public, not to the person of the functionary to whom it is offered, considered merely as an individual. It follows, then, that the contempts of court are either crimes or misdemeanors, in proportion to the aggravation of the offense, and as such are included within the pardoning power of the state," and the prisoner was discharged. It appeared in that case that Hickey had been sentenced to fine and imprisonment for contempt of the circuit court at Vicksburg, and was pardoned by Governor Albert Gallatin Brown. The prisoner was released upon habeas corpus, the court sustaining the right of the governor to exercise the pardoning power in such a case. Re Mullee, 7 Blatchf. 23, Blatchford, District Judge, said, viz.: "On a motion for an attachment against the applicant as a defendant in a suit in equity in this court, he was adjudged to have been guilty of a contempt of this court, by violating an injunction issued by this court; and on the 27th of June, 1868, a fine of $2,500 was imposed on him as a punishment for such contempt, and it was ordered that he should stand committed until the fine should be paid. After having been imprisoned for some time under such sentence, he presented a petition to this court, praying for his discharge on the ground that he was unable to pay the fine. The decision of the court thereon was that it had no jurisdiction or power to grant the prayer of the petition, and that relief must be sought by an application to the President of the United States. I then said: By the Constitution (art. 2, § 2, subd. 1) the president is invested with power "to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." No such power is conferred upon any other officer or upon any court. A contempt of court is an offense against the United States. In the present case there is a judgment judicially declaring the contempt and offense. . . . In the case of one Dixon, a fine was imposed upon him by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Mississippi for a contempt of court. He applied to the President for a pardon. The attorney general, Mr. Gilpin (3 Ops. Atty. Gen. 622), decided that the pardoning power extended to such a case, and that the contempt was an offense, within the language of the provision of the Constitution. I fully concur in this view; and it necessarily follows that, if the power of relieving from the sentence imposed on Mullee falls within the pardoning power of the President, it is exclusive in the President, and cannot be exercised by this court. . . . The inquiry made of the attorney general in the Case of Dixon was whether the executive authority to pardon properly extended to that case. In his opinion, given to the secretary of state in February, 1841, the attorney general says: 'If we adopt, as the Supreme Court of the United States has decided we should do, the principles established by the common law respecting the operation of a pardon, there can be no doubt it may embrace such a case. A pardon has been held to extend to a contempt committed in Westminster Hall, under circumstances not materially different from those which occurred in the case submitted to the President. I am therefore of opinion that, should the President consider the facts such as to justify the exercise of his constitutional "power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States," there is nothing in the character of this offense which withdraws it from the general authority.'

After a careful review of the authorities we are thoroughly satisfied with the former rulings of this court on this subject, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Alexander H. REVELL, Appt.,

v.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois.

(177 Ill. 468.)

1. The owner of premises bounded on Lake Michigan takes no title to any submerged land under the waters of the lake.
2. A purpresture may be enjoined and abated in a court of equity, although it is not injurious and is not a public nuisance.
3. Piers built into the waters of Lake Michigan to protect the land of a shore owner from erosion, and not in aid of navigation, the effect of which is also to reclaim submerged land of which the fee is vested in the state in trust for the people, constitute a purpresture which the state may require to be removed, although they are not detrimental to the public interest and will not become so until the state wishes to reclaim and use the land.

(December 21, 1898.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiffs in an information in equity to remove purprestures which defendant had placed in a lake in front of his property; the defendant appealing from so much of the decree as held the erections illegal; and plaintiffs appealing from so much as refused to order their immediate removal. Reversed on plaintiffs' appeal.

Statement by Craig, J.:

This was an information in equity, brought in the circuit court of Cook county in the name of the people, by the attorney general, against Alexander H. Revell, as the owner of a certain tract of land bordering on Lake Michigan. The information alleges that so much of Lake Michigan as is included by lines running north from the point where the eastern boundary of the state of Illinois strikes the southern bend of said lake, to a point in the middle of the said lake in north latitude 42 deg. 30 min., and thence west along that parallel, is within the state of Illinois; that the soil or submerged land lying or being under the waters of Lake Michigan aforesaid, within the limits of the state of Illinois, to the line or point on the shores of said lake within the limits aforesaid, belongs to, and the title thereto is, by virtue of the common law in force in said state, vested absolutely in, the state of Illinois, free from the obstruction and interference of private parties therein; that it is the duty of the state to preserve such waters and submerged lands for the use of the public, to be used and enjoyed by them free and unmolested by erections and inclosures of any kind thereon made by private individuals, or others claiming to own the adjoining shore, without the sanction or authority of said state of Illinois; that no municipal or private corporation or individual has any right, power, or authority to exercise exclusive control over the submerged land aforesaid, or to trespass and intrude on the same, by the erection of cribs, piers, jetties, breakwaters, bulkheads, obstructions, or inclosures of any kind, extending beyond the usual water line on the shore of Lake Michigan, or to reclaim by the means aforesaid, or otherwise, the submerged land so described, the same being subject to the supervision, ownership, and control of the state of Illinois as aforesaid; that Alexander H. Revell is now, and for a long time previous has been, the owner of, or interested in, a certain tract of land, described as follows: Sublot 1 in assessor's subdivision of lots 1 and 2 in the city of Chicago subdivision of the E. fractional  $\frac{1}{2}$  of section 28, township

40, range 14, E. of the third P. M., and block 6 (except the west 7 feet thereof) in Gehrke & Brauckmann's subdivision of the S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the N. E. fractional  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the N. W. fractional  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 28, township 40, range 14, E. of the third P. M., bordering on said lake, in the county of Cook, Illinois; that said Revell has, by the construction of piers, reclaimed from the bed of the lake a large amount of land (about 250 feet) lying east of the premises described; that the land so reclaimed belongs to the state; that said Revell has further constructed piers of timber and stone 130 to 200 feet at right angles to the shore, upon the submerged land opposite said premises, for the purpose of filling in and reclaiming further large tracts, said piers being extensions of or similar to the structures above mentioned; that the said Revell claims the right, as riparian owner, to reclaim the said lands and to reclaim other lands by the means aforesaid, and disputes the title of the state to such reclaimed and submerged lands; that said structures are solely for the purpose of reclaiming submerged land, and not in aid of navigation or commerce, or to protect the land of said Revell from erosion; that said Revell has no right to construct such piers even for the purposes aforesaid; that the said structures are an irreparable injury to the state, and a purpresture, and should be abated, or seized for the benefit of the state; that there is no remedy at law for the injury aforesaid, wherefore the informant prays a perpetual injunction against said Revell from further filling in and reclaiming; that said piers be abated; that defendant be enjoined from building piers in the bed of Lake Michigan and from doing any work on said piers, or from filling in any of the bed or encroaching on the waters of Lake Michigan.

The answer of said Revell claims the ownership of the land in question from a time long prior to the filing of the information; denies that by the construction of piers he has reclaimed the whole or a large portion of said premises from the bed of said lake; denies he has constructed piers, as alleged in the information, for the purpose of reclaiming land from the lake; avers that he constructed a pier of a permanent character on the south line of his premises, at right angles to the shore, but denies it was made to reclaim submerged land; and avers it was built lawfully, to protect his land from erosion; that prior to its construction there had been violent erosion, and his land was threatened with further waste; that said pier was erected to save and protect his land, and does not extend into the waters proper of the lake; denies that it is an intrusion or an interference with navigation; denies that it is a purpresture, and insists that the people have no interest or right in its removal. The defendant further set up in his answer that the information was not brought on behalf of the people, but by the commissioners of Lincoln Park, who are interested in getting a decision as to the rights of littoral owners, whose lands they may desire hereafter to condemn and acquire, and who, to get an expression of the courts on that subject, instigated this suit, which is therefore not brought in good faith. The answer concludes with a general denial of allegations not admitted, confessed, traversed, or denied. Subsequently a supplemental answer was filed, in which the defendant set up that since the filing of the answer the commissioners of Lincoln Park had prepared and adopted a plan for the enlargement of Lincoln Park, and the location of a boulevard over the bed of the lake opposite to, and about 1,200 feet east of, defendant's premises, the land under the water between said boulevard and the shore line as it existed at the time of the adoption of said plan to be reclaimed for park purposes, and had made an estimate of the cost of such improvement, all in accordance with an act of the general assembly approved June 15, 1895; that said plan was adopted and said action taken about March 20, 1896.

Replication was filed to the answer and supplemental answer, and the cause was referred to the master to take proofs. A hearing was had on the pleadings and evidence, and the court, in its decree, finds that the cribs, piers, breakwaters, or bulkheads described in said information and in the answer filed herein, constructed by the said defendant, Revell, as charged in said information and admitted by said answer to have been constructed, are trespasses on the submerged lands of Lake Michigan, the title of which lands was at the time of their erection in the state of Illinois, and that they are purprestures, but finds that they were built for the protection of the defendant's land from erosion by the waters of Lake Michigan; that they are not detrimental to the public interest, and will not become so until the state of Illinois wishes to reclaim and use the submerged lands on which they stand; "that the said defendant and all claiming through or under him, be, and hereby are, perpetually enjoined from building hereafter, opposite to or in connection with his land described in the information, any pier, crib, breakwater, bulkhead, or other artificial device or construction on the submerged lands under Lake Michigan for the purpose of making any land or reclaiming any submerged lands for the purpose of protecting the lands above described from erosion by Lake Michigan, or for any other purpose whatever; that the said piers, breakwaters, or bulkheads now existing, opposite and connected with the said land, are, so far as they stand on the submerged lands of Lake Michigan, purprestures, and subject to abatement by the state of Illinois whenever said state shall desire to reclaim or use the submerged lands on which the said piers, breakwaters, or bulkheads stand; that because of its finding that the said purprestures are not detrimental to the public interests, and will not become so until the state of Illinois wishes and undertakes to reclaim and use the submerged lands on which they stand, the court does not now order the said purprestures abated; that the said defendant, and those claiming through, by, or under him, be perpetually enjoined and restrained from in any manner interfering with the state of Illinois, or with the commissioners of Lincoln Park, as the agents and trustees of the state of Illinois, in their taking possession of the submerged lands of Lake Michigan opposite to, eastward of, and adjoining the land of the defendant in said information described, up to the water's edge, and at the time such possession is taken, and reclaiming the same, and using the same for park purposes; that whenever the said state of Illinois, directly or by its said agents or trustees, may choose to take such possession and reclaim and use the said submerged lands up to the water's edge opposite and adjoining the land or lot of the defendant, it may abate and remove, without let or hindrance from the defendant, or those claiming by, from, or under him, any structure, piers, cribs, breakwaters, or bulkheads found standing on said submerged lands eastward of the said water line, and the said Revell, and those claiming by, through, or under him, is and are hereby perpetually enjoined and restrained from any interference with such abatement or removal." To reverse this decree the defendant prayed for and obtained an appeal. As will be observed, the court, in its decree, found from the evidence that the piers were built for the protection of defendant's land from the erosion of the waters of Lake Michigan, and that they were not detrimental to the public interest, and would not become so until the state of Illinois wished to reclaim and use the submerged land upon which they stood; and the court refused to order the said purprestures abated until the state of Illinois directly or indirectly took possession of, and reclaimed and used, the submerged lands adjacent to the defendant's holdings. Upon these points the appellee has assigned cross errors.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It has been suggested in the argument of counsel for appellant that the people have no interest in this litigation,—that the real parties in interest are the commissioners of Lincoln Park. We do not regard this position as sustained by the record. The suit was instituted in the name of the people, by the attorney general. The commissioners of Lincoln park, as a board, have taken no action whatever in reference to the commencement or prosecution of the action, nor have they any interest in the result, except such as may be shared by the people at large. So far as appears, the attorney general, representing the people, brought the action in good faith for and on behalf of the people. The commissioners of Lincoln park were not made parties to the proceeding nor are they mentioned in the information. It is true that the defendant, by a supplemental answer, undertook to bring into the controversy the rights of the commissioners of Lincoln park under an act of the legislature; but that matter was not responsive to anything found in the information, and, in our opinion, it had no proper place in the record. When the commissioners of Lincoln park undertake to condemn or otherwise appropriate any part of the submerged lands of the lake fronting upon the premises of appellant, then will be the proper time to determine their rights and their powers, but until that time arrives nothing need be said upon that question.

The appellant, as a shore owner, constructed from his premises into the lake two piers, extending from the shore into the waters of the lake some 200 feet, and the main question involved here is his right to build and maintain those structures. A description of the structures so built by appellant in the lake will be found in appellant's argument, substantially as follows: "Defendant purchased the premises in question in July, 1890. The pier at Barry avenue was built by Fitz Simons, at Revell's instance, in the fall of 1890, and the addition on the east end in 1891. The whole structure is about 220 feet in length,—20 feet on land, and 200 feet in water. The north side consists of close piling, and the south of piles 6 feet apart, with single sheeting. The two sides are about 8 feet apart, and the space between is filled with riprap, with two lines of planking on the top to walk on. The pier at George street is not quite so long, and is made of a single row of piling, spaced and sheeted and anchored to piles to the south. At the east end is a bulkhead 8 by 15 feet, filled with riprap, and covered with plank. The latter was built by the O. B. Green Dredging Company in 1893. Both piers are practically perpendicular to the shore."

The law is well settled in the different states that the title to and dominion over lands covered by tide waters within the boundaries of the several states belong to each state wherein the lands are located. The state holds the fee in trust for the public. The doctrine established in regard to lands covered by tide waters has also been held applicable to lands bounded by fresh water in our large lakes. People, Moloney, v. Kirk, 162 Ill. 138; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 9, 38 L. ed. 335. In the case last cited it is said: "By the common law, both the title and the dominion of the sea, and of rivers and arms of the sea, where the tide ebbs and flows, and of all the lands below high-water mark, within the jurisdiction of the Crown of England, are in the King. Such waters, and the lands which they cover, either at all times, or at least when the tide is in, are incapable of ordinary and private occupation, cultivation, and improvement, and their natural and primary uses are public in their nature, for highways of navigation and commerce, domestic and foreign, and for the purpose of fishing by all the King's subjects. Therefore the title, jus privatum, in such lands, as of waste and unoccupied lands, belongs to the King as the sovereign; and the dominion thereof, jus publicum is vested in him as the representative of the nation and for the public benefit." In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 149 U. S. 452, 36 L. ed. 1042, speaking of this question, the court said: "That the state holds the title to the lands under the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, within its limits, in the same manner that the state holds title to soils under tide water, by the common law, we have already shown, and that title necessarily carries with it control over the waters above them whenever the lands are subject to use. . . . It is a title held in trust for the people of the state, that they may enjoy the navigation of the waters, carry on commerce over them, and have the liberty of fishing therein freed from the obstruction or interference of private parties." Indeed, the doctrine that the state holds the title to the lands covered by the waters of Lake Michigan in trust for the people is not controverted in the argument. It will not, therefore, be necessary to cite further authorities upon that question.

The appellant here owned the premises bordering on the lake, but his title to the premises extended only to the water's edge, and the fee in and to the lands covered by the waters of the lake was vested in the state, and held by the state in trust for the people. The fee being in the state, the important question presented is whether appellant, without a grant or other authority from the state, had the right to go upon the submerged lands and erect the structures complained of in the information. This state has adopted the common law as it existed prior to March 24, 1606,—the fourth year of James I.; and, in the absence of any statute of the state changing the common law in regard to the rights of riparian or littoral owners, the common law as it then existed must control. Upon an examination of the authorities, we think it is clear that the act complained of in the information was a trespass upon the lands of the state; that the erection of the piers in the lake in front of appellant's premises was a purpresture. But it is said in the argument that the erection of the structures complained of was not injurious to the state, and hence there was no basis for the interference of a court of equity. We do not concur in that view. Although the act complained of was not injurious, and was not a public nuisance, still it was an unlawful act, of such a character as would properly authorize a court of equity to interfere, upon the information of the attorney general, as is well established by the authorities. Coulson and Forbes on the Law of Waters (p. 15) say: "Any unauthorized intrusion or encroachment upon the soil of the shore, such as the building of quays, piers, moles, etc., is termed a 'purpresture,' and may be abated by the Crown or the owner of the shore, or restrained by injunction at suit of the attorney general, whether they create a nuisance or not. Such purprestures may or may not be nuisances to navigation. Whether they are so or not is a question of fact." On page 670 the authors say: "Any invasion of the right of the Crown to the bed of the sea or navigable river is a purpresture, and may be restrained by injunction at the suit of the attorney general, whether it be a nuisance or not. If the act complained of be merely a trespass upon the property of the Crown, and not a nuisance to the navigation, the court will generally direct an inquiry whether it is more beneficial to the Crown to abate the purpresture or suffer it to remain." Wood on Nuisances (§ 84) says: "A purpresture purely, is not indictable; but, when a purpresture and encroachment is both a purpresture and a nuisance, it is indictable, abatable, and punishable as for a nuisance. The remedy for a purpresture, simply, is by information in equity at the suit of the attorney general or other proper officer." Eden on Injunctions (chap. 11, p. 259), in discussing the question, says: "Purpresture,—or more properly pourpresture,—is derived from the French pourprise, and, according to Lord Coke, signifies a close or inclosure; that is, when one encroacheth and makes that several to himself which ought to be common to many. It is laid down by all the old writers, that it might be committed either against the King, the lord of the fee, or any other subject. But in its common acceptance, it is at present understood to mean any encroachment upon the King, either upon part of the demesne lands, or in the highways, rivers, harbors, or streets. The remedy for this species of injury is either by information of intrusion at common law, or by information at the suit of the attorney general in equity. In case of a judgment upon an information of intrusion, the erection complained of, whether it were a nuisance or not, was abated; but upon a decree upon an information in equity, if it appeared to be a purpresture, without being at the same time a nuisance, the court might direct an inquiry whether it was most beneficial to the Crown to abate the purpresture, or to suffer the erections to remain and be arrested." Story, in his Equity Jurisprudence (§ 922), says: "In cases of purpresture, the remedy for the Crown is either by an information of intrusion at the common law or by an information at the suit of the attorney general in equity. In the case of a judgment upon an information of intrusion, the erection complained of, whether it be a nuisance or not, is abated. But upon a decree in equity, if it appear to be a mere purpresture, without being at the same time a nuisance, the court may direct an inquiry to be made, whether it is most beneficial to the Crown, to abate the purpresture, or to suffer the erections to remain and be arrested." Gould on Waters (§ 21) declares: "There is a broad distinction between a violation of the public right and an invasion of the proprietary interest of the Crown. The one creates a public nuisance; the other, a purpresture. Any encroachment upon the King, either upon part of the demesne lands or any public rivers, harbors, or highways, is called a purpresture. If a littoral proprietor, without grant or license from the Crown, extends a wharf or building into the water in front of his land, it is a purpresture, though the public rights of navigation and fishery may not be impaired. . . . The remedy for a purpresture is either by an information of intrusion at common law, or by information in equity at suit of the attorney general." In Angell on Tide Waters (p. 200) will be found this language: "A wharf or pier or other erection may therefore be below high-water mark, or even below low-water mark, but not necessarily a nuisance, though a purpresture. The remedy for a purpresture, it is laid down, is either by information of intrusion at common law, or by information at the suit of the attorney general in equity. The judicial department of the English court of exchequer is divided into one of equity and one of law, and the primary business of the former is to recover any lands belonging to the Crown, so that purprestures upon arms and creeks of the sea are proper subjects of information in the court of exchequer. The King's attorney general, on the part of the Crown, may proceed, for the purpose of protecting either the jus privatum of the King from the purpresture or the jus publicum of the subject from nuisance, by information on the King's remembrancer's side of the exchequer by English bill, praying a personal decree against the defendant in the suit." See also Atty. Gen. v. Terry, L. R. 9 Ch. 423; Atty. Gen. v. Burridge, 10 Price, 350; Atty. Gen. v. Parmeter, 10 Price, 378; Atty. Gen. v. London, 8 Reav. 270. In opposition to the above authorities the case of People v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 379, is cited and relied upon. In that case it was held that the district courts of California have no power to decree the destruction, or to enjoin the erection of a wharf, unless it is or will be a nuisance, or is or will be followed by some form of irreparable damage, or unless it is or will be an appreciable hindrance to the execution of some legislative act relating to fishery or to commerce or navigation. So far as this case is in conflict with the rule established by the authorities cited, we are not inclined to follow it. We think the decided weight of authority is that a purpresture may be enjoined or abated in a court of equity, although it is not injurious or not a public nuisance.

But, aside from this position, it is apparent from an examination of this record that the construction of the piers was injurious to the state. It is true, the appellant testified that the piers were constructed to prevent erosion, and protect his shore bordering on the lake; but it is apparent from the evidence that the effect has been to add new land to his premises, and that the accretions resulting from the construction of the piers have extended the boundary of his premises into the lake. In other words, the erection of the piers has increased appellant's land, and diminished the land belonging to the state. This being so, it cannot be said that the construction of the piers was not injurious to the state. The appellant had no right to build piers or "wharf out" into the lake for the purpose of making land or increasing the boundary of his premises, nor had he the right to do any act which would produce that result. As has heretofore been said, the lands covered by the waters of the lake belong to the state, and appellant had no right, by any device whatever, to extend his boundary line beyond the water's edge; and when he did so an injury was inflicted on the rights of the state, which might be inquired into and abated in a court of equity on the application of the attorney general.

It is, however, insisted that the court erred in decreeing that appellant had no riparian rights as against the state. We do not understand that the decree goes to the extent claimed in the argument. But, however that may be, the main question presented by the record and discussed in the argument is, What are the riparian rights of appellant, as a shore owner, on Lake Michigan? There is one riparian right, which existed at common law, which is not disputed or called in question in the argument, and that is: Where land bordering on the lake gradually and imperceptibly encroaches upon the water, the accretion thus made belongs to the shore owner. This riparian right of appellant was not disturbed or interfered with by the decree. The shore owner also has another riparian right which is undisputed,—the right of access from his land to the lake; in other words, the right to pass to and from the waters of the lake within the width of his premises as they bordered on the lake. This right cannot be diverted or taken from the shore owner without just compensation being made therefor as provided by law. These are common-law rights, and, as we understand the law, they are the only common-law rights possessed by the shore owner. Other rights may have been conferred in different states by statute, usage, or custom, but the question involved here is whether such additional rights exist in this state. In the well-known case of Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 9, 38 L. ed. 335, the Supreme Court of the United States, after a thorough examination of the authorities, held that the common law of England is the law of this country upon the question of the rights of a shore owner, except where it has been modified by the Constitutions, statutes, or usages of the different states, or by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The court also held that the rights of these owners have been committed to the several states, and that each state has dealt with the lands under tide water within its boundaries according to its own notion of right and public policy. We are aware of no statute of this state changing the common law, nor has there been established any custom or usage which modifies the common law. What, then, is the common law in regard to the right of a shore owner to build out from the shore into the waters of the lake, as was done by appellant in this case? In Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 9, 38 L. ed. 335, after declaring that it is settled in England that the title to the soil of the sea, or arms thereof, below ordinary high-water mark, is in the King, it is said: "It is equally well settled that a grant from the sovereign of land bounded by the sea, or any navigable tide water, does not pass any title below high-water mark, unless either the language of the grant, or long usage under it, clearly indicates that such was the intention. . . . By the law of England, also, every building or wharf erected, without license, below high-water mark, where the soil is the King's is a purpresture, and may, at the suit of the King, either be demolished, or be seized and rented for his benefit, if it is not a nuisance to navigation. [Citing many cases.] By recent judgments of the house of lords, after conflicting decisions in the courts below, it has been established in England, that the owner of land fronting on a navigable river in which the tide ebbs and flows has a right of access from his land to the river; and may recover compensation for the cutting off of that access by the construction of public works authorized by an act of Parliament, which provides for compensation for 'injuries affecting lands,' 'including easements, interests, rights, and privileges in, over, or affecting lands.' The right thus recognized, however, is not a title in the soil below high-water mark, nor a right to build thereon, but a right of access only, analogous to that of an abutter upon a highway. Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Bd. of Works, L. R. 5 H. L. 418; Lyon v. Fishmongers' Co. L. R. 1 App. Cas. 662. "That decision," says Lord Selborne, "must be applicable to every country in which the same general law of riparian rights prevails, unless excluded by some positive rule or binding authority of the lex loci." North Shore R. Co. v. Pion, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 612-620. Affirming 14 Can. S. C. 677. The common law of England upon this subject, at the time of the emigration of our ancestors, is the law of this country, except so far as it has been modified by the charters, constitutions, statutes, or usages of the several colonies and states, or by the Constitution and laws of the United States." Under the common law as declared in this case,—and it is fully sustained by the authorities,—it is apparent that appellant, as owner of premises bounded on Lake Michigan, took no title to any submerged lands under the waters of the lake; nor did he, by virtue of being a shore owner, have any right to construct piers upon the submerged lands without the consent of the state.

It is, however, suggested in the argument that this court, in passing upon the rights of riparian owners upon the Mississippi and other rivers in the state navigable in fact, but not navigable at law, has held that the shore owner may "wharf out" from the shore into the stream, and that the same doctrine should be extended to a shore owner on Lake Michigan. Those cases have no bearing here, for the reason that they all are predicated on the theory that the line of the riparian owner extends to the center thread of the stream. Being the owner of the soil under the water, he had the right to build such structures on his own land as he might desire, except such as might interfere with the navigation of the stream. Under the rule established in those cases, beginning with Middleton v. Pritchard, 4 Ill. 510, 38 Am. Dec. 112, it was held in Ensminger v. People, 47 Ill. 384, 95 Am. Dec. 495, that a riparian owner in the Ohio river, having the title to the land between high and low water mark, and the right to the exclusive use thereof, had the right to establish a private wharf on his land, and make reasonable charges for its use by those navigating the river. The right, however, as is apparent from the rule established in the case, rests upon the ownership of the underlying soil. Much reliance is, however, placed, in the argument, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018. It is true that the majority of the court in that case held that a littoral owner of lands bordering on Lake Michigan had the right to wharf out from his premises into the lake, in aid of navigation; but upon an examination of that case it will be found that the decision is predicated largely upon Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984; St. Paul & P. R.

Co. v. Schurmeir, 7 Wall. 272, 19 L. ed. 74; and Dutton v. Strong, 1 Black, 23, 17 L. ed. 29, or two of them; and in Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 9, 38 L. ed. 335, decided two years after the Illinois Central Case, the doctrine laid down in the three cases above cited seems to have been substantially repudiated. It is there said: "Some passages in the opinions in Dutton v. Strong, . . . St Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeir, . . . and Yates v. Milwaukee . . . were relied on by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, as showing that the owner of land adjoining any navigable water, whether within or above the ebb and flow of the tide, has, independently of local law, a right of property in the soil below high-water mark, and the right to build out wharves, so far, at least, as to reach water really navigable. But the remarks of Mr. Justice Clifford in the first of those cases, upon which his own remarks in the second case and those of Mr. Justice Miller in the third case were based, distinctly recognized the diversity of laws and usages in the different states upon this subject. . . . And none of the three cases called for the laying down or defining of any general rule, independent of local law or usage, or of the particular facts before the court. . . . In Dutton v. Strong . . . there can be no doubt of the correctness of that decision, for, even if the pier had been unlawfully erected by the defendants as against the state, the plaintiffs had no right to pull it down or injure it, and, upon the facts of the case were mere trespassers upon the defendant's possession. . . . In Schurmeir v. St. Paul & P. R. Co. . . . the question in controversy was whether the plaintiff's patent was limited by the main shore, or extended to the outside of the island. The supreme court of Minnesota held that, by the law of Minnesota, land bounded by a navigable river extended to low-water mark, at least, if not to the thread of the river; and that the plaintiff's title therefore extended to the water's edge at low-water mark and included the island, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. 10 Minn. 82 (Gil. 59) 88 Am. Dec. 59. This court affirmed the judgment, saying: '. . . express decision of the supreme court of the state was, etc.', . . . In Yates v. Milwaukee . . . the point adjudged was that the mere declaration of the city council that the wharf already built and owned by the plaintiff was a nuisance did not make it such, or subject it to be removed by authority of the city. It was recognized in the opinion that by the law of Wisconsin, established by the decisions of its supreme court, the title of the owner of land bounded by a navigable river extended to the center of the stream, subject, of course, to the public right of navigation. . . . And the only decision of that court, which this court considered itself not bound to follow was Yates v. Judd, 18 Wis. 119, upon the question of fact whether certain evidence was sufficient to prove a dedication to the public. . . . The later judgments of this court clearly establish that the title and rights of riparian or littoral proprietors in 43 L. R. A.

the soil below high-water mark of navigable waters are governed by the local laws of the several states, subject, of course, to the rights granted to the United States by the Constitution." If the three cases cited did not call for the laying down of a general rule independently of local law or usage in the states, as was held in the Shively Case, the doctrine laid down in the Illinois Central Case could not be predicated upon those cases. Moreover, we regard the rule established by the common law as the safer and better doctrine, and as each state has the right to determine for itself the title and rights of riparian owners within its border, we regard it a better policy for all concerned to adhere to the common-law rule rather than follow the doctrine laid down in the Illinois Central Case. Moreover, the learned justice who delivered the opinion of the court in the Illinois Central Case, in Weber v. Board of State Harbor Comrs. 18 Wall. 57, 21 L. ed. 798, practically concedes the correctness of the doctrine laid down in the Shively Case. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, while recognizing the correctness of the doctrine that a riparian proprietor whose land is bounded by a navigable stream has the right of access to the navigable part of the stream in front of his land, and to construct a wharf or pier into the stream, subject to such general rules and regulations as the legislature may prescribe for the protection of the public, said: "In the absence of such legislation or usage, however, the common-law rule would govern the rights of the proprietor, at least in those states where the common law obtains. By that law the title to the shore of the sea, and of the arms of the sea, and in the soils under tidewaters is, in England, in the King, and, in this country, in the state. Any erection thereon without license is, therefore, deemed an encroachment upon the property of the sovereign, or, as it is termed in the language of the law, a purpresture, which he may remove at pleasure, whether it tend to obstruct navigation or otherwise."

Cases from other states have been cited by the appellant and appellee as sustaining their respective views of riparian rights, but it would extend this opinion to too great a length to enter upon a review of those cases. Moreover, local laws, customs, and usages enter so largely into the decisions of the courts in the different states that such decisions cannot, as a general rule, control as precedents here. But if the right to wharf out in aid of navigation existed, as held in the Illinois Central Case, the rule thus established could have no application here, as the piers erected by the appellant in this case were not constructed in aid of navigation. That is not claimed or pretended from anything appearing in the record. It is, however, insisted that owners of land bordering on Lake Michigan have the right, as riparian owners, to wharf out in order to protect the shore of their lands from erosion. If a right of this character exists, it is one not recognized by the common law. As we understand the common law, any structure placed upon the land of the state below or beyond the water's edge in the waters of the lake is a purpresture, and may be abated in a proceeding instituted on behalf of the people. A shore owner may, no doubt, erect on his own land such structures as may be necessary to protect his land from erosion, provided such structures do not interfere with navigation, but he has no right to intrude upon the lands of the state, unless authorized by the state. Tyler, in his work on Boundaries (p. 95), states the doctrine of protection in the following language: "There can be no doubt that by the law of England encroachments cannot be made on the property of the Crown or its grantee. . . . But if an embankment which is lawfully made on a man's own land cause a silting up of sand and mud, whereby soil is gradually gained from the sea, the owner of the embankment would appear to be entitled to this increase, upon the principle laid down in respect to alluvion and reliction. . . . An encroachment upon the King, or upon part of the demesne lands, or in the highways, public rivers, harbors, or common streets, is called a purpresture. This word frequently occurs in the judicial reports of both this country and England, and invariably signifies an encroachment of this kind. . . . A man may raise an embankment on his own property to prevent the encroachments of the sea, although the effect of his doing so may be to cause the water to beat with violence against the adjoining land, thereby rendering it necessary for the adjoining landowner to enlarge or strengthen his defenses." Wood on Nuisances (sec. 494) says: "Every proprietor of land exposed to the inroads of the sea may erect on his own land groins or other reasonable defenses, for the protection of his land from the inroads of the sea. . . . But a man has no right to do more than is necessary for his defense, and to make improvements at the expense of his neighbor." Gould on Waters (§ 160) says: "The owners of lands exposed to the inroads of the sea or of inland waters may erect walls and embankments to prevent the wearing away of the land or to protect it from overflow. . . . If a sea wall or embankment is erected in tide waters beyond the limits of the owner's land, it is doubtless illegal at common law as being a purpresture, since it does not appear that littoral proprietors are authorized, as against the Crown, or without its sanction, to erect even defenses against the sea below high-water mark." Reliance is, however, placed by appellant in King v. Pagham Sewer Comrs. 8 Barn. & C. 355. Expressions may be found in that case that seem to sustain the view of appellant; but upon an examination it will be found that what was said was not necessary to a decision of the case, or applicable to the facts involved therein, and we do not regard the expressions used in deciding the case as authority on the question. See Coulson & Forbes, Waters. 32. It may be conceded that under the doctrine of protection a shore owner may erect structures on his own land for protection against erosion, but, as we understand 43 L. R. A.

the law, he has no right to enter upon the lands of the state and erect thereon such structures, and when he undertakes to do so he is a trespasser. The state, holding the submerged lands of the lake in trust for the people of the state, would be false to its trust should it permit shore owners to encroach on the public domain, and gradually appropriate such property to their own use. Here, in the erection of the structures complained of in the information, there has been a clear violation of the law, and no reason occurs to us why the structures should not be abated on the application of the people.

The decree in this case was in favor of the complainant, but, after a careful consideration of the whole record, we do not think it goes far enough. We think the cross errors of appellee are well assigned.

The decree will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded, on the cross errors, with directions to the circuit court to enter a decree according to the prayer of the information, in conformity to the views here expressed.

alleged to have resulted from an alleged conspiracy by defendants to break up plaintiff's business. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Howard Henderson and Francis W. Walker, for appellants:

Appellants cannot be held liable for the mere inducing of others to break their contracts, the parties themselves who broke their contracts being the only ones liable. They were free agents, and not coerced or influenced by force or fraud.

Appellants cannot be held liable for independent intervening causes of damage in themselves sufficient to cause the injury complained of. And so far as direct intervening causes of damage at laundries to which appellee went long after the commission of the acts charged in the declaration, and in which the evidence in no wise connects appellants, were sufficient of themselves to occasion injury, as to such injury at such laundries, previous acts of appellants must be considered too remote.

The acts of appellants in inducing parties to break their contracts with appellee were not merely malicious acts, done solely with the intent to injure her, but were in the line of legitimate trade competition, and for this they cannot be held liable.

That the acts which appellants are charged to have done were done in pursuance of a conspiracy does not create any liability. In the civil action of conspiracy 43 L. R. A.

the damage illegally done, and not the conspiracy, is the gist of the action.

Appellants cannot be held liable for inducing S. P. Miller, Hamlin Bros., Armstrong and Sargent, and Cook & Williamson to terminate their contractual relations with appellee, because appellant's acts could not produce the injuries complained of without the intervention of an independent force, which force was the act of the parties themselves who broke their contracts, and were the efficient cause of the damages suffered by her.

On petition for rehearing.

A malicious motive cannot be a cause of action. Competition in trade does not become unlawful because actuated by motives of malice.

The English authorities cited by the court in support of the doctrine that a malicious motive may be a cause of action, so far as they apply to a state of facts like that in the case at bar, having been disapproved by the English House of Lords in the case of Allen v. Flood should be reconsidered. And the American cases cited by the court, depending as they do for their authority upon the same English cases so disapproved in part, should also be reconsidered in the light of that decision.

Allen v. Flood, 67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 119, [1898] A. C. 1; Huttly v. Simmons, 67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 213; Perrault v. Gauthier, 28 Can. S. C. 241; Davis v. United Portable Hoisting Engineers, 28 App. Div. 396; Chambers v. Baldwin, 91 Ky. 122, 11 L. R. A. 545.

Among the American cases opposed to those cited in the opinion are the following:

Chambers v. Baldwin, 91 Ky. 122, 11 L. R. A. 545; Payne v. Western & A. R. Co. 13 Lea, 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666; Hegwood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 225, 46 Am. Rep. 373; Bourlier Bros. v. Macauley, 91 Ky. 136, 11 L. R. A. 550; Boyson v. Thorn, 98 Cal. 578, 21 L. R. A. 233; Continental Ins. Co. v. Board of Fire Underwriters, 67 Fed. Rep. 310; Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499; Macauley Bros. v. Tierney, 19 R. I. 255, 37 L. R. A. 455.

There are many other American authorities to the general effect that a malicious motive will not make that unlawful which would otherwise be lawful.

Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82, 23 Am. Rep. 30; Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. 385, 20 Am. Dec. 623.

The following cases deal particularly with the element of right or justifiable cause, and in so doing define the limits of legitimate competition:

In order to render the defendants liable for wilfully inducing parties to break their contract or contracts with the plaintiff, done by the defendants with the intention of causing injury to the plaintiff, without right or justifiable cause, and from which acts damage results to the plaintiff, it is not necessary that such inducements should be with either force, fraud, threats, or intimidations.

Such inducement on the part of the defendants will give a cause of action if consisting merely of advising or arguing that it would be to the business interest of the one breaking the contract, if such acts were done by the defendants maliciously, without right or justifiable cause, and with the intention of injuring the plaintiff, if damages actually result therefrom.

Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216; Bowen v. Hall, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 333; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206; Delz v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400.

Malice is the intent to injure another, without right or justifiable cause.

Where an injury is maliciously inflicted, the jury may, in addition to the actual damages sustained, visit upon the wrongdoer vindictive or punitive damages for the double purpose of setting an example and of punishing the wrongdoer.

Grable v. Margrave, 4 Ill. 372, 38 Am. Dec. 88; Sherman v. Dutch, 16 Ill. 283; Dean v. Blackwell, 18 Ill. 336; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Rector, 104 Ill. 296; Harrison v. Ely, 120 Ill. 83.

In actions in tort the jury have necessarily a wide latitude, and the question of the extent of damages is almost exclusively for the jury. A verdict will not be disturbed on the ground of excessive damages unless it seems probable from the amount of the damages assessed that the jury acted under the influence of prejudice, passion, or misconception of the evidence.

Schlenker v. Risley, 4 Ill. 483, 38 Am. Dec. 100; Chicago & R. I. Co. v. McKean, 40 Ill. 218; Baker v. Young, 44 Ill. 42, 92 Am. Dec. 149; Chicago v. Smith, 48 Ill. 107; Freeman v. Higley, 61 Ill. 287; Douglas v. Gausman, 68 Ill. 170; Conrad Seipp Brewing Co. v. Doody, 25 Ill. App. 305.

The amount of exemplary damages is entirely within the discretion of the jury, and the verdict can be set aside by the court only when it is grossly excessive or evidently actuated by passion, prejudice, or undue influence.

Whether or not the loss at Coleman & Newman's, Brigham & Finch's, Armstrong & Sargent's, or other places, where the evidence in this case tended to show a loss to the plaintiff, was or was not the result of the acts of the appellants in their attempt to break up the business of the appellee, as a proximate cause, or was the result of a new and independent factor for which appellants were not responsible, could not have been determined by the trial court as a question of law; it could only be properly tested by hearing the evidence and submitting the facts to the jury under appropriate instructions, and, having been passed upon by the appellate court, cannot be reviewed by this court.

Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Bluhm, 109 Ill. 20, 50 Am. Rep. 601; Mt. Carmel v. Howell, 137 Ill. 91; Meyer v. Butterbrodt, 146 Ill. 131.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee instituted an action on the case, alleging that in 1890, and several years prior thereto, she was conducting a laundry office in the city of Chicago, where she received clothing from various customers to be laundered; that she did not own a laundry plant herself, but employed other operating laundries, who, when the work was done returned the same to her for delivery to her customers; that she had built up a good and profitable business; that appellants conspired to injure her in her good name and credit, and to destroy her business, because she would not increase the price charged by her to customers in accordance with the scale of prices fixed by an organization known as the Chicago Laundrymen's Association, and to that end wilfully and unlawfully, by intimidation and unlawful inducements, caused parties who were doing her work (five of whom were mentioned in the declaration) to refuse to longer do the same, and by threats, intimidation, false representations, and unlawful inducements caused others who were operating laundries (who were specifically designated in a bill of particulars) to refuse to take or do her work; that this was done for no justifiable purpose, but to cause loss to the plaintiff and injure and destroy her business; that various persons with whom she had engagements to so do her work, in consequence of the acts of the appellants broke their contracts with her, and the business she had built up as a laundry agent was destroyed and entirely broken up, and she thereby sustained great loss and damage by reason of appellants so contriving, plotting, and conspiring, by the 43 L. R. A.

means aforesaid, to break up and destroy her said business.

The evidence shows that plaintiff had a contract with one Miller, who operated a laundry, and who agreed to do her work and give her two weeks' notice before he would quit doing it, and that through the interference of appellants he refused to do her work without giving the notice agreed on. Subsequently she applied to other laundrymen, who agreed to do her work as long as the laundry association did not interfere. She made arrangements with other laundries, by written agreement, by which her work was to be done. In one case the contract was for a year, and according to the testimony in this record that contract was broken by the party contracting with her almost as soon as made. One contract with Joseph Apple, by which her laundry work was to be done for one year, was violated. The officers of this association, as testified to by the witness who entered into the contract with appellee, interfered, and sought to injure the plaintiff by having him keep back her work, retaining it as long as possible, to her detriment, and also by having him retain parts of the work. He testifies: "They told me that they would give me $300, a horse and wagon, and enough work to keep me going, provided I would keep back her work and retain it as long as I possibly could, to the detriment of her patronage. That was at the first meeting, and I agreed to that. I kept a bundle out. At the second meeting, they made threats to me if I didn't accept that they would ruin my business at any rate, as well as hers." Another witness who agreed to do her work as long as the laundry association would let him alone, was induced, by threats of destroying his business, to cease connection in business with appellee. The evidence shows that appellants were active in inducing these various breaches of contract, as well as other contracts entered into between her and various parties engaged in operating laundries.

Issues were joined, and upon a trial in the circuit court of Cook county defendants were found guilty and the plaintiff's damages were assessed by a jury at $6,000. Motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were overruled and judgment was entered on the verdict, to which defendants excepted. On appeal to the appellate court for the first district the judgment was affirmed, and this appeal is prosecuted.

The contention of appellants is, that they cannot be held liable for merely inducing others to break their contracts; that the parties who broke their contracts were the only ones liable, they being free agents and not coerced or influenced by force or fraud; that their acts in inducing parties to break their contracts with appellee were not mere malicious acts, done solely with the intent to injure her, but were in the line of legitimate trade competition, for which they cannot be held liable; nor can they be held liable, they claim, for acts which are charged to have been done in pursuance of a conspiracy, as it is insisted that a conspiracy does not create a liability in a civil action, as the damage illegally done, and not the conspiracy, must be the gist of the action.

The common law seeks to protect every person against the wrongful acts of others, whether committed alone or by combination, and an action may be had for injuries done which cause another loss in the enjoyment of any right or privilege or property. No persons, individually or by combination, have the right to directly or indirectly interfere or disturb another in his lawful business or occupation, or to threaten to do so, for the sake of compelling him to do some act which, in his judgment, his own interest does not require. Losses wilfully caused by another, from motives of malice to one who seeks to exercise and enjoy the fruits and advantages of his own enterprise, industry, skill, and credit, will sustain an action. It is clear that it is unlawful and actionable for one man, from unlawful motives, to interfere with another's trade by fraud or misrepresentation, or by molesting his customers or those who would be customers, or by preventing others from working for him or causing them to leave his employ by fraud or misrepresentation or physical or moral intimidation or persuasion, with an intent to inflict an injury which causes loss. A conspiracy may, when accompanied by an overt act, create a liability, by reason of the fact that one or more conspirators may do an unlawful act which causes damage to another, by which all those engaged in the conspiracy for the accomplishment of the purpose for which the injury was done, and which was done in pursuance of the conspiracy, would be alike liable, whether actively engaged in causing the loss or not. For acts illegally done in pursuance of such conspiracy, and consequent loss, a liability may exist against all of the conspirators. Appellants, and those persons who refuse to do appellee's work, had each a separate and independent right to unite with the organization known as the Chicago Laundrymen's Association, but they had no right separately or in the aggregate, with others, to insist that the appellee should do so, or to insist that appellee should make her scale of prices the same as that fixed by the association, and make her refusal to do this a pretext for destroying and breaking up her business. A combination by them to induce others not to deal with appellee or enter into contracts with her or do any further work for her was an actionable wrong.

Every man has a right, under the law, as between himself and others, to full freedom in disposing of his own labor or capital according to his own will, and anyone who invades that right without lawful cause or justification commits a legal wrong, and, if followed by an injury caused in consequence thereof, the one whose right is thus invaded has a legal ground of action for such wrong. Damage inflicted by fraud or misrepresentation, or by the use of intimidation, obstruction, or molestation, with malicious motives, is without excuse, and actionable. Competition in trade, business, or occupation, though resulting in loss, will not be restricted or discouraged, whether concerning property or personal service. Lawful competition that may injure the business of another, even though successfully directed to driving that other out of business, is not actionable. Nor would competition of one set of men against another set, carried on for the purpose of gain, even to the extent of intending to drive from business that other set and actually accomplishing that result, be actionable unless there was actual malice. Malice as here used, does not merely mean an intent to harm, but means an intent to do a wrongful harm and injury. An intent to do a wrongful harm and injury is unlawful, and if a wrongful act is done to the detriment of the right of another it is malicious, and an act maliciously done, with the intent and purpose of injuring another, is not lawful competition. In this case it is clear the evidence sustained the allegations of the plaintiff's declaration, and there is here no contention on the facts. The principles herein announced are sustained by the weight of authority in England and in this country. Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216; Blake v. Lanyon, 6 T. R. 221; Sykes v. Dixon, 9 Ad. & El. 633; Pilkington v. Scott, 15 Mees. & W. 657; Hartley v. Cummings, 5 C. B. 247; Bowen v. Hall, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 333; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206; Delz v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400; Curran v. Galen, 52 N. Y. S. R. 479; Van Horn v. Van Horn, 52 N. J. L. 284, 10 L. R. A. 184.

In Mogul S. S. Co. v. M'Gregor, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 476, Lord Coleridge said: "It seems that a large number of important and rich shipowners joined together, and they issued two circulars or documents . . . to the different traders and their agents with whom they had been in the habit of dealing in the tea trade and other trades in China, . . . to the effect that, if the persons whom that circular reached and was meant to affect should deal with the plaintiffs or plaintiffs' ships, they, the defendants, would deny them all the benefits, or at least a very large and substantial benefit, which had accrued to them in their dealing with the defendants; . . . that, if the persons to whom they addressed the circular would deal exclusively with them they should have certain advantages at their hands. . . . It is certainly conceivable that such a conspiracy,—because conspiracy undoubtedly it is,—as this might be proved in point of fact, . . . were made out to be, not the mere honest support . . . of the defendant's trade, but the destruction of the plaintiffs' trade, and their consequent ruin as merchants, it would be an offense for which an indictment for conspiracy, and if an indictment, then an action for conspiracy, would lie; . . . that a conspiracy to do the thing which has been called by the name of boycotting is unlawful and an indictable offense, and, if so, then a thing for which an action will lie, an action may well lie for that which is complained of here."

It is urged by appellants that they cannot be held liable for inducing certain persons named in the declaration to terminate their contractual relations with appellee, because their acts could not produce the injuries complained of without an independent force which was the act of the parties themselves, and these appellants, it is urged, cannot be held liable for an intervening cause of damage sufficient to cause the injury; and that the refusal of different persons to work for the appellee was sufficient, of itself, to occasion injury, for which the appellants cannot be held responsible. The first branch of this proposition has been disposed of by what we have heretofore said, and the authorities above cited. In Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, it was said: "He who maliciously procures a damage to another by violation of his right ought to be made to indemnify." In Bowen v. Hall, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 333, it was said: "Merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact. . . . But if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff . . . it is . . . actionable, if injury ensues from it."

The second branch of the proposition, in which it is urged that appellants could not produce the injuries complained of without the intervention of an independent force, presents the question whether the proximate cause of the injury is a question of fact. It has been settled by the adjudication of this state, so far as this question is here concerned, that in this state what was the cause of the injury, or the combination of causes producing it, is a question of fact. Whether the injury and damage sustained by plaintiff resulted from the acts of the defendant, or were the result of a new, independent factor for which appellants were not responsible, cannot be determined by the court as a question of law, unless the fact be conceded or the proof be substantially all to that effect. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Bluhm, 109 Ill. 20, 50 Am. Rep. 601; Mt. Carmel v. Howell, 137 Ill. 91; Meyer v. Butterbrodt, 146 Ill. 131. The finding of the trial and appellate courts on this question is not subject to review in this court.

It is next insisted that the damages are excessive. This has so repeatedly been held to be an error which cannot be assigned in this court that citation of authority will be unnecessary.

What has been said in the discussion of the questions heretofore presented effectually disposes of all questions raised on giving, refusing, and modifying instructions.

The judgment of the Appellate Court for the First District affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of Cook County is affirmed.

filed, Phillips, J., subsequently delivered the following additional opinion:

Appellants present their petition for a rehearing of this cause, and have brought to the attention of the court the case of Allen v. Flood [67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 119, [1898] A. C. 1], decided by the House of Lords in Great Britain, which was not accessible at the time the opinion in this case was written. Since the petition for rehearing was presented counsel have procured a full report of that case and brought the same to the attention of the court. From that case it appears that boiler makers in common employment with the respondents, Flood and another, who were shipwrights working on wood, objected to working with the latter on the ground that in a previous employment they had been engaged on iron work. The appellant, an official of the boiler-makers' union, in response to a telegram from one of the boiler-makers, came to the yard and dissuaded the men from immediately leaving their work, as they threatened to do, intimating that if they did so he would do his best to have them deprived of the benefits of the union and also fined; that they must wait till the matter was settled. The appellant, Allen, then saw the managing director, to whom he said that if the respondents, who were engaged from day to day, were not dismissed, the boiler-makers would leave their work or be called out. Respondents were thereupon dismissed. The men so discharged instituted their action against the official of the boiler-makers' union, and obtained judgment, which was affirmed by the court of appeal, and on appeal to the House of Lords the assistance of the judges was requested, and the question submitted to the judges was: "Assuming the evidence to be given by the plaintiffs' witnesses to be correct, was there any evidence of a cause of action fit to be left to the jury?" Six of the eight judges answered in the affirmative and two in the negative. It appears there was no contract, as the men were engaged by the day, and were liable to be discharged at the close of any day, without a breach of contract; that the only question presented by that case was, (1) "Did the defendant Allen 'maliciously induce' the company to discharge the plaintiffs? (2) Did he 'maliciously induce' the company not to engage them?" and it was held if the defendant's action was in itself lawful it was not made unlawful by the motive. It is a very different thing to do a lawful act with a proper motive, and to do an illegal act with a malicious motive. The facts in the case of Allen v. Flood are entirely different from the facts presented in this record. There was no contract in that case, the breach of which was induced by the defendant. Here, existing contracts, which were a property right in the plaintiff (the appellee), were broken; and this was brought about by the action of the defendants in inducing those contracting with her to violate their contracts. This caused a right to be taken away, in consequence of which she was injured and damaged.

After a careful consideration of the case of Allen v. Flood, and with a full recognition of the importance of the principles involved in the questions presented by this record, we are constrained to adhere to what has been said in our opinion heretofore, and must deny the petition for rehearing.

Rehearing denied.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

James M. BOUTWELL et al.

William MARR et al.

(.....Vt.....)

1. Withdrawal of patronage from a person by members of an association by concerted action becomes illegal when the concert of action is procured by the coercion of a by-law which imposes a fine or penalty upon any member who violates it.
2. The fact that members of an association voluntarily assumed its obligations in the first instance does not make legal a by-law which, by fine or penalty, compels them to act in concert in withdrawing their patronage from another person.
3. Exemplary damages cannot be recovered in an action against the several members of an association for acting in concert to withdraw their patronage from a dealer, when some of them have been coerced by a by-law which imposed a penalty for its violation.

(February 15, 1899.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to the action of the Washington County Court in entering judgment for plaintiffs upon a special verdict in an action brought to recover damages for conspiracy which resulted in the ruining of plaintiff's business. Judgment reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George W. Wing, C. A. Frou-ty, and J. P. Lamson for defendants.

Messrs. W. A. Lord, John L. Senter, and Dillingham, Huse, & Howland for plaintiffs.

Munson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 6th day of June, 1893, the plaintiffs obtained a bond for the conveyance of a mill in Barre, equipped with machinery for polishing granite; and on the 16th day of the month they received a deed, and took possession of the property, and became copartners, under the name of the Boutwell Polishing Company. The mill had been operated for several years by the plaintiffs' grantor; and, in the interval between the taking of the bond and the receipt of the deed, the plaintiffs saw the patrons of the mill, and received assurances of a continuance of their custom, limited in the case of some patrons by the mention of an expectation or a possibility of their putting in polishing machines of their own. From the time of their purchase until November the work of the mill averaged over $1,000 a month, that of the last month being but little below that amount. In November the receipts were some less than $200. In December and January the mill was without work, and substantially all that it did after that was upon stock purchased by the company from parties outside of Barre. On the 19th of April, 1894, the mill was sold to one of the defendants. No complaint was ever made of the plaintiffs' work or their methods of business. During this time there was an organization in Barre called the "Granite Manufacturers' Association," which embraced about 95 per cent of all the granite manufacturers in the place. There was also an organization located at Boston, called the "Granite Manufacturers' Association of New England," with which were connected the local organizations of the New England states, including that at Barre. All the defendants held by the verdict were members of the Barre association. Neither the plaintiffs' firm nor any of its members were connected with this or any similar organization. Prior to November, 1893, the Barre association adopted by-laws, which prohibited dealings with members not in good standing, and imposed fines for the violation of its rules. On the 10th of November the association indorsed a resolution previously adopted by the New England Association, which recommended that none of its members sell any rough stock, partly finished or finished granite, directly or indirectly, to any firm, individual, or corporation engaged in cutting, quarrying, or polishing granite in any of the New England states or in New York City, and not a member of the association. On the 24th of November the association adopted a resolution of the following terms: "Resolved for the purpose of strengthening the association, and [for] the mutual protection of its members, [that] no trade shall be conducted with any individual, firm, or corporation engaging in cutting, quarrying, or polishing granite in the state of Vermont, who are not members of this association."

George Lamson, a defendant, testified that he assisted in the formation of both associations, and had been connected with them ever since; that he was notified by a circular of the action taken November 10; that the effect of that resolution would be that, if a company declined to join the association, no member of the association would thereafter do any business with it. Alexander Gordon, another defendant, testified that he understood that the main reason for the collapse of the plaintiff's business was the passage of the resolution; that he voted for it, and did so believing that it would have that effect on their business; that, after its passage, he stopped sending work to the plaintiffs; and that he did so because of that vote. It appears from the testimony of some of the defendants that during the summer and early fall of 1893 they had several conversations with John W. Dillon, the manager of the plaintiff's business, in regard to their becoming members of the association, in which they expressed a desire to have them join. Mr. Kemp, one of the plaintiffs, testified that some time in November, and after the loss of their business, defendant Kelliher asked him why they would not join the association, and said they would find out that they would have to join it before they could do any business. Mr. Senter, an attorney for the plaintiffs, testified that, in December, defendant Eagan, on coming out from an interview with the plaintiffs, said to him that "they would find out they couldn't do any polishing business until they joined the association." Mr. Kemp further testified that in January, 1894, he had two interviews with certain defendants, at their suggestion, in which the question of plaintiffs' joining the association was discussed at length. His testimony tended to show that the first of these meetings was with defendants Ady and Gordon, and that Ady remarked that the object of the interview was to see if they could induce the plaintiffs to join the association, but that they hardly expected to get them to, as they supposed plaintiffs were still stubborn about joining; that later in the conversation he used substantially these words, "I will admit that the effect of that resolution was to destroy the business of your company in one day, but it is my opinion that, if you will join the association, you can get your business all back in one day;" and that Gordon on being appealed to by Ady, affirmed his statement; that the second of these interviews was with the defendant J. D. Smith, who said it was true that the action of the association had had the effect to close plaintiffs' mill, but that he was perfectly confident that it could be started up, with all their old customers, at once, if they would join the association.

The defendants have not brought up their exceptions to the charge, but stand on their motion that a verdict be directed for want of sufficient evidence to make them liable. There was clearly evidence tending to show that the defendants undertook to compel the plaintiffs to join the association by depriving their mill of work, and that they made use of their organization as a means of concerted action to accomplish their purpose. But there was no evidence tending to show that the defendants made any attempt to compel persons, not members of the association, to withhold their patronage, and they insist that they cannot be made liable for simply withholding their own.

The crime of conspiracy consists in a combination of two or more persons to effect an illegal purpose, either by legal or illegal means, or to effect a legal purpose by illegal means. State v. Stewart, 59 Vt. 273, 59 Am. Rep. 710. But the grounds of recovery in a civil suit are not identical with the elements of the crime. The law punishes the mere agreement to effect an illegal purpose or to use illegal means. But it is clear that a civil action cannot be sustained unless something causing damage to the plaintiff has been done in furtherance of the agreement; and it is claimed to be also requisite that the thing done be something unlawful in itself. This would preclude a reliance upon the existence of an illegal purpose, and require that the means used be illegal. The agreeing together to effect an illegal purpose being itself illegal, it might seem that any act done in furtherance of the agreement, and resulting in damage, even though not itself a violation of right, would sustain a recovery. But the view suggested is not sustained by the authorities, and we proceed with our inquiry upon the assumption that there can be no recovery unless illegal means were employed.

It is clear that everyone has a right to withdraw his own patronage when he pleases, but it is equally clear that he has no right to employ threats or intimidation to divert the patronage of another. If it be true as a general proposition that several may lawfully unite in doing to another's injury, even for the accomplishment of an unlawful purpose, whatever each has a right to do individually, it by no means follows that the combination may not be so brought about as to make its united action an unlawful means. The defendants insist that, as members of the association, they had a right to resolve to keep their work among themselves, and that, in the absence of anything tending to show an attempt on their part to influence the action of others, they cannot be held liable. It may be true that if the defendants, acting independently of any organization, and moved solely by similarity of interest and views, had united in withdrawing their patronage, the effect upon the plaintiffs' business would have been the same, and yet the defendants have incurred no liability. But, in the case supposed, the united action would result from the free exercise of individual choice. It will be seen upon further inquiry that this cannot be said of the action of an organization like that operated by the defendants.

It is true, as suggested in argument, that everyone engaged in business is liable to have it injured or destroyed by the action of those upon whom he depends for patronage. But, when those upon whom he depends for patronage are acting as individuals, he has a measure of security in the probability that different preferences will be shown by persons left to their own choice; and, if some who desire to injure his business secure the co-operation of others by unlawful means, the law gives him a remedy. If the defendants are right, he can be deprived of this security and this remedy by converting those who desire his injury into the majority of an association, and those who do not into a suppressed minority, held to the designated course by the pressure of a system of fines and penalties. But giving a new face to an old wrong can never defeat the remedy, for the law will inquire as to the substance of the thing complained of. If the plaintiffs were in fact injured by a forced withdrawal of patronage secured through the action of defendants' organization, they are entitled to redress. Without undertaking to designate with precision the lawful limit of organized effort, it may safely be affirmed that when the will of the majority of an organized body, in matters involving the rights of outside parties, is enforced upon its members by means of fines and penalties, the situation is essentially the same as when unity of action is secured among unorganized individuals by threats or intimidation. The withdrawal of patronage by concerted action, if legal in itself, becomes illegal when the concert of action is procured by coercion. In this case it could easily be found that a fine of $50 for a violation of the rules was not intended to be applied to rules adopted to secure a performance of the ordinary duties of membership. If in fact designed to hold unwilling members to unity of action in an aggressive movement of unlawful character, the defendants cannot complain if the law so treats it. The jury could properly infer from the nature and management of the defendants' organization that their united action was due in part to the means adopted to secure it. The force of the measure resolved upon lay partly in the fact that the by-laws threatened penalties against any who should fail in carrying it into effect.

The fact that the members of the association voluntarily assumed its obligations in the first instance, so far as it is a fact, is not controlling. The law cannot be compelled by any initial agreement of an associate member to treat him as one having no choice but that of the majority, nor as a willing participant in whatever action may be taken. The voluntary acceptance of by-laws providing for the imposition of coercive fines does not make them legal and collectible, and the standing threat of their imposition may properly be classed with the ordinary threat of suits upon groundless claims. The fact that the relations and processes deemed essential to a recovery are brought within the membership and proceedings of an organized body cannot change the result. The law sees in membership of an association of this character both the authors of its coercive system and the victims of its unlawful pressure. If this were not so, men could deprive their fellows of established rights, and evade the duty of compensation, simply by working through an association. But it can hardly be supposed that the defendants' organization reached its present proportions without some previous use of the methods disclosed by the evidence above cited; and, as far as its membership was due to coercion, there was a further element of unlawful pressure in the enforcement of the united action against the plaintiffs. It would be strange, indeed, if the members of an association organized upon such a basis, and advanced by such means, could meet a claim of this nature by saying that they had made no attempt to secure the co-operation of outside parties. It is clear that if the association had comprised but a small portion of the manufacturers, and had destroyed the plaintiffs' business by compelling the manufacturers to join them in withholding patronage, its members would have been liable. But it is claimed, in effect, that a business can be destroyed with impunity when the organization has become so extensive that there are no outside patrons to control, or so few that their course is a matter of no moment. Upon this theory, every successful instance of coercion would increase the safety with which another coercion could be attempted, and, when coercion had been pursued until but one contumacious person remained, immunity would be complete. It is clear that the law cannot concede to organizations of this character the powers and immunities claimed for their association by these defendants, and retain its own power to protect the individual citizen in the free enjoyment of his capital or labor.

The evidence excepted to was properly admitted. Evidence that the defendants individually expressed a purpose to continue to patronize the mill, in connection with evidence that they did so without complaint until the general withdrawal, was evidence tending to characterize the withdrawal when made. The items offered as showing the profit of the mill tended to establish the damages according to the rule adopted by the court, and no question is now made as to the correctness of that rule. Evidence of the existence and rules of the New England association was admissible because of the connection of that body with the local organization. The resolution and by-laws of the Barre association, the agreement of that association with the Boston Wholesalers' Association in restriction of the sales of its members, the appointment of a committee to inquire as to violations of its rules, the official correspondence had with one of its members upon that subject, the fact that a fine was imposed for an ascertained violation, and the action of the association in assuming the defense of its secretary when sued because of a letter written in respect to an alleged violation, were all admissible as showing the purpose and use of the organization, and its coercive character as against its own members. The statements of different defendants indicative of their purpose and of members of the association not defendants as to the force and effect of the vote, made contemporaneously with and in explanation of their action under it, were clearly admissible.

The case stands upon grounds which are inconsistent with the allowance of exemplary damages; for damages of this nature, if ever recoverable against several defendants, are recoverable only where all are shown to have been moved by a wanton desire to injure. The exemplary damages were separated by a special verdict, but were included in the judgment rendered.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for actual damages, with interest from date of judgment below.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Jed HOTCHKISS, Trustee, Appt.,
v.

Samuel MIDDLEKAUF et al.

(.....Va.....)

1. Power to convey land is not included in a power of attorney to demand and receive real and personal estate and prosecute suits, and to perform all and every act and thing whatsoever requisite and necessary to be done in and about the premises.
2. A conveyance by a committee, of the land of a lunatic, is not valid, when authorized only by judgment of a court of another state, in which the lunatic and the committee reside.
3. A waiver, to be effective, must be made with full knowledge of the rights which one intends to waive.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Rockingham County in favor of complainants in a suit to enjoin the prosecution of an action in ejectment to recover possession of certain real estate and for partition thereof. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Bumgardner, Jr., J. Lewis Bumgardner, and Rudolph Bumgardner, for appellant:

The plaintiff had a right to try his title at law, and to have the facts upon which the validity of his title depended ascertained by the verdict of a jury, unless the defendants in ejectment were prevented by fraud, accident, or surprise from making defense at law, or unless the plaintiff occupied some relation to the defendants exclusively cognizable in equity, which precluded the plaintiff from asserting against the defendant a superior legal title.

Oxford's Case, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. pt. 2, p. 676.

A partition suit cannot be made a substitute for an action of ejectment.

Pillow v. Southwest Virginia Improv. Co. 92 Va. 145.

The original jurisdiction of courts of chancery in cases of partition was only where the complainants had a clear legal title, and where any doubt arose in regard to the complainant's title the court either dismissed the bill or retained the case until the question of title was tried at law.

2 Minor, Inst. ed. 1877, 417.

And so it is clear that where there is no relation of tenant in common, joint tenant, or coparcener between complainant and respondent, there can be maintained no suit for partition, and equity can have no possible jurisdiction to try the title to the land.

Devlin, Deeds, § 223, note 1; Pease v. Pilot Knob Iron Co. 49 Mo. 124; Code 1887, §§ 2464, 2438.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Hotchkiss, trustee, brought an action of ejectment in the circuit court of Rockingham county against Samuel Middlekauf and others to recover 5,000 acres of land lying in said county. Before this cause was tried, the defendants filed a bill in chancery, in which they allege that the 5,000 acres which is the subject-matter of the ejectment suit was part of a larger tract of land originally granted by the commonwealth on the 8th of February, 1796, to one Gambill, and that by virtue of certain deeds they have become the owners of the land in controversy, and have thus become "joint owners" with the plaintiff in ejectment in the proportion which the 5,000 acres bears to the whole of the original patent, the title to the residue of which they concede is in Hotchkiss, trustee. In accordance with the prayer of the bill, proceedings in the action of ejectment were enjoined, and the chancery cause coming on to be heard upon the bill, answer, exhibits, depositions, and the report of the commissioner in chancery, to whom it had been referred, the court decreed "that the complainants . . . be quieted in their possession and ownership of the 5,000 acres of land known as the 'Hill Survey' upon the terms indicated in the report of Commissioner Liggett." The cause is before us upon an appeal from that decree.

Appellant urged upon the court that there was error in the decree, for the reason, among others, that the bill was to be taken as claiming a tenancy in common upon the part of the plaintiffs with the defendants, while the decree was in favor of the plaintiffs for an ascertained tract of 5,000 acres; but, without entering upon any discussion of that and other technical objections taken to the proceedings in the circuit court, we shall content ourselves with an inquiry into the title presented for our consideration by the appellees, and endeavor to ascertain whether they have shown any right whatever to the real estate in controversy.

Their alleged title, like that of the appellant, begins with the grant from the commonwealth of Virginia to Matthew Gambill, dated February 8, 1796, and the chains of title of appellant and appellees are coincident until the deed from States Wilkins and George F. Butler, attorney in fact, and committee of Helen Hawkesworth, to James R. Mount, is reached.

Appellees claim under a deed to James R. Mount from George F. Butler claiming to act as the attorney in fact of States Wilkins and as committee of Helen D. Hawkesworth, a lunatic. Placing the title by this means in James R. Mount, they deduce it through him to Prosper Knowlton, and as to the land of Prosper Knowlton appellees claim that it was sold for taxes, and conveyed by Little W. Gambill, clerk of the county court of Rockingham, to one John N. Hill, of said county, by deed dated the 5th of December, 1857. By Hill it was conveyed to J. D. Price by deed of the 7th of April, 1866, and from him, by several deeds shown in the record, and not disputed, it is vested in the appellees. The deed to Mount was, as we have seen, executed by George F. Butler, as attorney in fact for States Wilkins, and committee of a lunatic; and his power and authority, both as attorney in fact and as committee, are denied by the appellant.

The authority to execute a deed must be by deed, for "the law requires that a power of attorney to execute a deed should be in writing and of the same solemnity as the deed itself; . . . [and the] . . . authority [of the agent] should be co-extensive with the act to be done, and the instrument clothing him with the authority as complete as the deed which he is to give." 1 Devlin, Deeds, 2d ed. § 356.

The following power of attorney is exhibited with the record:

Know all men by these presents that I, States Wilkins, of the city of New York, have made, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do make, constitute, and appoint, my friend, George F. Butler, of said city, my irrevocable, true, and lawful attorney for me and in my name, place, and stead to ask, demand, and receive of and from any person or persons all such real and personal estate as I may be entitled to by virtue of my being a son and heir at law of Jacob Wilkins and Ann, his wife, late of the city of New York, deceased; and I do hereby irrevocably authorize and empower the said George F. Butler to commence and prosecute in my name any suit or suits in that behalf, and to compromise or settle or compound the same, or either of them from time to time, as he may deem proper, with full power of substitution, irrevocably giving and granting unto my said attorney full power and authority to do and perform all and every act and thing whatsoever requisite and necessary to be done in and about the premises, as fully to all intents and purposes as I might or could do if personally present, with full power of substitution and revocation, hereby ratifying and confirming all that my said attorney or his substitute shall lawfully do or cause to be done by virtue hereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal the 29th day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four.

States Wilkins. [L. S.]

Powers of attorney are strictly construed. "While the general rule governing the interpretation of all contracts or written instruments that the intention of the parties is to be considered in construing their language, applies to the construction of powers of attorney, yet powers of attorney are construed strictly, and the authority is never considered to be greater than that warranted by the language of the instrument, or indispensable to the effective operation of such authority. 'Powers of attorney are, ordinarily, subject to a strict construction; or, rather, the authority given is not extended beyond the meaning of the terms in which it is expressed.' 1 Devlin, Deeds, 2d ed. § 358.

The power of attorney under consideration nowhere authorizes the agent to sell and convey. He is empowered "to demand and receive of and from any person or persons all such real and personal estate" as States Wilkins may be entitled to as son and heir at law of Jacob Wilkins and Ann, his wife.

Just such an instrument came under consideration before the court of civil appeals of Texas. Said the court: It was "found as a conclusion of law that the power of attorney from Parsons and wife to Duncan, Morgan, and Adams did not authorize them to sell the land in controversy. The court did not err in this conclusion. The power conferred was 'to bring suit for, settle up, compromise, release, obtain, or recover the interest belonging to and owned by Louisa C. Parsons,' etc. The power is not given to sell and convey. Powers of attorney are strictly construed, and the extent of authority must be ascertained from the terms of the instrument itself."

So far, therefore, as George F. Butler undertook to convey, as attorney in fact of States Wilkins, his deed is a nullity, because the authority under which he assumed to act conferred no power to execute such an instrument. George F. Butler and States Wilkins were appointed a committee of Helen D. Hawkesworth, a lunatic, by order of the chancery court of the state of New York, on the 23d of May, 1836, and on the 8th of August of the same year, upon the petition of George F. Butler, stating that Helen D. Hawkesworth was interested in two large tracts of land in the counties of Rockingham, Albemarle, and Orange in the state of Virginia, that the lands were entirely unproductive, that there was no prospect of their improving in value, that it was to the interest of the lunatic that her interest should be sold, and praying for authority to sell the same, it was referred to one of the masters of the court to ascertain whether it would be advantageous or beneficial to the said lunatic that all her right, title, and interest in the land should be sold. The master was required to report with all convenient speed. He obeyed the order by submitting a report of even date with the order itself, in which he states that the land consists of about 20,000 acres; that it is not worth 5 cents per acre, and he does not believe it could be sold for any price in cash; that one half of it belongs to the lunatic; and that, if it is not disposed of, it will probably be sold for taxes. Upon these facts he is of opinion that it would be advantageous and beneficial to Helen D. Hawkesworth, the lunatic, that all her right, title, and interest in said land be sold.

The proceedings in the courts of the state of New York by which Helen D. Hawkesworth was adjudged a lunatic, and George F. Butler was appointed her committee, and authorized to sell her land in the state of Virginia, and the deed executed by him in conformity with and obedience to that order constitute the only authority with which Butler was clothed to divest the title of Helen Hawkesworth, and transmit it to his grantee. Nor is it pretended that there is any other deed from her upon which the title of appellees to the land of which she was seised can rest. It is settled law that real estate is exclusively subject to the laws and jurisdiction of the courts of the nation or state in which it is located. No other laws or courts can affect it. Story, Conf. L. § 591. And it was said by Chancellor Zabriske in Davis v. Headley, 22 N. J. Eq. 115: "I find no case in which a statute, judgment, or proceeding in one country has been held to affect such property when situate in another country, or beyond the jurisdiction of the sovereign or court making the statute or decree." It is true "that in cases of fraud, trust, or contract, courts of equity will, whenever jurisdiction over the parties has been acquired, administer full relief without regard to the nature or situation of the property in which the controversy had its origin, and even where the relief sought consists in a decree for the conveyance of property which lies beyond the control of the court, provided it can be reached by the exercise of its powers over the person and the relief asked is of such a nature as the court is capable of administering." Wimer v. Wimer, 82 Va. 901, and authorities there cited.

Between these two propositions there is not the slightest conflict. The decree of the court does not operate ex proprio vigore in the foreign state or territory, but having jurisdiction over the person, it will, in cases of fraud, trust, or contract, compel the party within its jurisdiction to obey its decree. As was said by Chancellor Wythe in Farley v. Shippen, Wythe, 135: "If an act performed by a party in Virginia, who ought to perform it, will be effectual to convey land in North Carolina, why may not a court of equity in Virginia decree that party, regularly brought before that tribunal, to perform the act? Some of the defendant's counsel supposed that such a decree would be deemed by our brethren of North Carolina an invasion of their sovereignty. To this shall be allowed the force of a good objection if those who urge it will prove that the sovereignty of that state will be violated by the Virginia court of equity decreeing a party within its jurisdiction to perform an act there, which act, voluntarily performed anywhere, would not be such a violation." In the last clause above quoted is to be found the very kernel of the matter. A foreign court can compel a party within its jurisdiction to do an act in Virginia, which act, if voluntarily performed by such party, would not violate the sovereignty. 43 L. R. A.

eighty of this state. If Helen Hawkesworth had been of sound mind, and had voluntarily conveyed the property in question, it would have been a valid act,—valid everywhere. So, if she had as a result of contract, trust, or fraud been under obligation to convey this property, the court of New York, having jurisdiction over her, could have compelled obedience to its decree, and that act which she could voluntarily have performed would have been equally valid, though done under the compulsion of a decree of a foreign court. But here we have no such case. Helen Hawkesworth was a lunatic. She has made no deed, and she was under no obligation, by contract or otherwise, to make a deed. The authority with which Butler, her committee, was clothed, is derived, not from her, but from the laws of New York, and the act of her committee derives its whole validity from the judgment of the court which clothed him with power as her committee, and upon his petition decreed the sale of the property of the lunatic lying beyond its jurisdiction and within the limits of this state.

We are of opinion that the deed from George F. Butler to James R. Mount as attorney in fact for States Wilkins and as committee of Helen D. Hawkesworth was ineffectual to convey the land in controversy. Nor do we think that any efficacy is imparted to it by the subsequent conduct of States Wilkins and of Mrs. Furman, the daughter and heir at law of Helen Hawkesworth, even if the deed of Butler as committee is to be considered as a voidable, and not as a void, act. Ratification and acquiescence imply knowledge, and there is no proof in this record that the acts relied upon as a ratification of or acquiescence in the assumption upon the part of George F. Butler of authority to execute the deed to Prosper Knowlton were performed with knowledge on the part of Wilkins and Mrs. Furman of the existence of that deed, and the circumstances attending its execution.

As was said by Judge Harrison in Wilson v. Carpenter, 91 Va. 192: "Confirmation must be a solemn and deliberate act." . . . No man can be bound by a waiver of his rights, unless such waiver is distinctly made with full knowledge of the rights which he intends to waive; and the fact that he knows his rights, and intends to waive them, must plainly appear."

As we have seen, appellees' title flowing from the deed of Butler to James R. Mount passed from him to Prosper Knowlton, and, he being delinquent in the payment of taxes, it was sold by the state, and a deed made by L. W. Gambill, clerk of Rockingham county court, on the 5th of December, 1857.

What has been said with reference to the deed of George F. Butler in his double capacity of attorney in fact and committee renders it unnecessary to say anything with respect to the deed from L. W. Gambill further than to remark that it conveyed only such title as was vested in Prosper Knowlton, who had no title, and could, therefore, transmit none.

Nor need we consider whether this tax deed could be, under the circumstances, regarded as constituting color of title, for there is no evidence of adversary possession by force of which color or claim of title could ripen into a good title.

Nor do we deem it proper to inquire into the title of appellant, nor to express any opinion with respect thereto.

We are of opinion, for the reasons stated, that the decree of the Circuit Court should be reversed; the injunction awarded dissolved, the bill dismissed, and the appellants left to prosecute their action of ejectment in the circuit court of Rockingham county without prejudices to the rights of the parties, plaintiff and defendant, to that suit, except in so far as we have found it necessary in this opinion to pass upon the validity of the deed to James R. Mount from George F. Butler as attorney in fact for States Wilkins, and as committee of Helen D. Hawkesworth.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Mrs. A. W. FISHER, Respt.,
v.

W. P. WALSH et al., Appts.

(.....Wis.....)

1. No recovery can be had for services under an entire contract where the employee voluntarily abandons work, without valid excuse, before the stipulated time.
2. Threats of strikers which excuse an employee for quitting service in breach of his contract, although they entitle him to recover the actual benefit conferred by his services, do not relieve him from liability for the damages sustained by the employer on account of his quitting the service, which must be deducted from his wages.
3. A requested instruction to find for defendants, if plaintiff quitted their services pursuant to an agreement for a strike, should not be qualified or confused by adding a clause as to his reason for quitting, and the effect upon him of danger or apparent danger.
4. A stipulation that the damages for breach of contract in quitting the service of a contractor for loading and unloading vessels and cars upon docks shall be the loss of fifteen days' wages is justified by the uncertainty as to the injury that may be caused thereby to the employer's business.

(February 21, 1899.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Douglas County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover wages alleged to be due and unpaid. Reversed.

Statement by Winslow, J.:

This was an action to recover $25.50, for fifteen days' personal services rendered by one McKillop to the appellants in June and July, 1896, the claim having been assigned by McKillop to the plaintiff. The answer, after a general denial, contained a counterclaim, alleging that McKillop was employed under an entire contract for the season of 1896, and that he breached said contract without cause, and claimed damages for such breach. On the trial it appeared that the defendants, as copartners, had entered into a contract with various railroad and steamboat companies for the loading and unloading of vessels and cars upon some of the docks at West Superior for the season of 1896, and had given bond for the prompt performance of such contract in a considerable sum. In order to perform this work, two classes of men were employed. One class, to which McKillop, plaintiff's assignor, belonged, were known as "day men," who were regularly employed under a contract which stipulated that they should work throughout the season of 1896, and should receive pay at a stipulated rate per day for every working day, whether work was provided for them or not. Of this class there were about 80 men. The other class, known as "hourly men," were employed casually, as the occasion arose, and paid by the hour for the time they in fact worked. Of these the defendants had employed at times some 300. McKillop, in common with the other day men, had entered into a written agreement of employment, which, in addition to the terms above mentioned, provided several ways in which it might be terminated; among others, the following: First, by first party or his agents discharging second party for any violation of this agreement in any respect; third, by the neglect, refusal, or inability of the second party at any time to obey the orders of the first party or his foreman; or to perform a fair and reasonable day's work; fourth, by the failure of the second party to perform any agreement therein. It further provided that, in case of termination for either of the above-mentioned causes, the first party might retain any wages then earned by the second party, not exceeding fifteen days' wages in all, to his own use, as and for liquidated damages for the breach thereof, which said sum was agreed to be the ascertained damages for such termination and breach, and a fair and full compensation therefor. It was also provided that payment should be made on the fifteenth of each month for the work done during the preceding month. The plaintiff knew or had heard when he signed the contract that the defendants had contracted with railroad and steamship companies as aforesaid, and were under bonds; that a large force was required to carry out their contracts; that boats and cars were liable to come in at all times of the day or night, and would have to be loaded or unloaded; and that it required a few experienced men to work with the inexperienced ones to safely and speedily conduct the work. It appears by the evidence that on the evening of the 6th of July, 1890, the so-called "hourly men" quit in a body, or "struck," demanding an increase of wages; and that the "Longshoresmen Union," on the following day, July 7th, discussed the question of that strike, and assumed control and jurisdiction of it for the hourly men, and served on the defendants a notice signed by their officers, demanding an increase of pay for the hourly men. It appears that McKillop had for something like a year been a member of the Longshoresmen Union, but had dropped out of active connection with it, and did not know that the union was having anything to do with the strike of the hourly men. The day men, continuing to work during the 7th and 8th of July, were interfered with by squads of the striking hourly men, and threatened with serious violence unless they also quit work. This interference did not occur at the docks where they were at work, but upon the streets, as they were going to and from their work. These threats were of personal injury, and, as plaintiff's assignor and others of the day men testified, put them in serious fear; so that on the evening of July 8 a considerable number of the day men, including McKillop, attended a meeting of the Longshoresmen Union, at which it was demanded that the day men also quit work, unless wages were raised both for the hourly and day men, and that such quitting take place at noon of the following day, unless the demands were acceded to; and a resolution was offered and passed that the day men must quit accordingly, unless such concessions were made. It does not appear that McKillop voted on this resolution, nor whether he entered into any agreement other than that which may be inferred from the fact that he was a member of the union, and hence impliedly bound to abide its decisions. McKillop testifies that he was again interfered with on the morning of the 9th on his way to work, by seven or eight of the strikers; and at noon he quit work, as did also all of the day men who belonged to the union, the defendants having declined to accede to their demands. McKillop testifies: "I was stopped on my way to work the morning of the day I quit." There were seven or eight of them. They asked me if I was going to quit. I said I didn't think I would. They said, if I didn't quit, they would club me to death; they would murder half of us down there. I said nothing more, but kept on going. I worked until noon that day. On our way home, we were met by another gang, and they told us to stay home that afternoon. I don't know who those men were. I didn't go back to work that afternoon. I was kind of scared of those men down there in the yard. I boarded at the corner of Third street and Banks avenue. I didn't consider it safe at any time after I 43 L. R. A.

quit, until the strike was over, for me to go back to work, and for that reason I remained away. I heard of men getting held up and attacked after I quit. I don't know what men they were. They were working for Mr. Walsh. I quit because I feared those men I met in going to and from my work would hurt me." On cross-examination he testified as follows: "It is a fact that the reason I quit was because the rest of the day men quit;" and, further: "I didn't know for sure at noon of July 9th that I was going to quit. I thought everything might be all right when we got home at noon; that is, the strike might be called off, or something. I was thinking that." After the day men quit, on the 9th of July, the strike continued for some days, the officers of the union exerting themselves to prevent men coming in from St. Paul and Minneapolis to supply the place of the strikers; and the defendants were undoubtedly put to great straits and large expense by reason thereof, though they were not allowed on the trial to go into that, it being held that their damages were liquidated by the written contract. The plaintiff claimed that there was due McKillop, when he quit, fifteen days' wages, which, at the contract price of $1.70, amounted to $25.50, and put in evidence a written assignment to her of all claim against the defendants for work, labor, and services done and performed during June, 1890, amounting to $25.50, dated July 24, 1890. The jury found for the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon, after first moving to set the verdict aside, as contrary to the evidence, the defendants appealed.

Mr. A. T. Reek for appellants.

Messrs. O'Brien & Vaughn, for respondent:

The plaintiff had a right to sue on a quantum meruit for the reasonable value of services performed under the contract after the termination thereof.

In the case of a partial performance of a contract, where full performance was prevented by reason of sickness, plaintiff was allowed to sue on a quantum meruit, and not on the contract.

When a special contract is in existence and open the plaintiff cannot sue on a quantum meruit. Here, the work was finally abandoned, and the jury found that no new contract had been entered into; under these circumstances the plaintiff ought not to lose the fruits of his labor.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question which was sharply litigated in this case was whether McKillop quit because of genuine and justifiable fear of serious bodily violence at the hands of the hourly men who had struck, or because of the agreement or resolution of the day men to strike at noon of the 9th of July, unless the demands of the hourly men were acceded to. There was evidence which would justify a finding either way on these propositions. Certainly there were ample facts which would justify the conclusion that McKillop quit because he chose to abide by the resolution, or, in other words, that he was in fact one of the second set of strikers. If such were the case no recovery could be had, because his contract was entire, and he voluntarily abandoned his work, without valid excuse, before the end of the stipulated time. Kopitz v. Powell, 56 Wis. 671. This proposition of law was substantially correctly stated in the following instruction, which was offered by the defendant: "You are instructed that if Mr. McKillop left his work under and pursuant to the agreement of the day men and the hourly men, on the night of July 8, 1896,—that is, to quit at noon, July 9th, if defendants did not concede to the proposition submitted to them on July 8th, then plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict shall be for the defendants." The court read this instruction to the jury, and added the following words: "That is, if that was the reason he quit, and the danger was not such—that the danger or apparent danger was not such—that the man of ordinary nerve would have refused or declined to go on with the work, your verdict will be for the defendants." We think that the addition of this limitation to the instruction was error. Irrespective of the statute which requires an instruction to be given as asked or refused in full (Rev. Stat. 1878, § 2853), we think the defendants were certainly entitled to have the instruction which they asked given without dilution or qualification. The proposition was that, if McKillop quit in pursuance of the agreement to strike, he could not recover, and the jury should have been so informed plainly and directly, without being required to determine, in addition, what would have been the condition of mind of a hypothetical man, who perhaps had entered into no agreement to strike. The last clause added a confusing element to a simple proposition, and it was error to attach it to the instruction as asked.

A more important and vital question, however, is yet to be considered. There was a motion to direct a verdict for the defendant, which was overruled, and exception taken; and this raises the question whether, in any view of the case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. It seems to have been assumed upon the trial below, and upon the argument in this court, that, if McKillop was excused in leaving the defendant's service on account of the threats of strikers to do him bodily harm, he can recover for the time of his actual service, without deduction for damages suffered by the master by reason of his breach of contract. Such is certainly not the law. If a servant is prevented from performing his contract by the act or fault of the master, the master cannot, of course, recover or recoup any damages, because the breach is his own. Wood, Mast. & S. 2d ed. § 148. But, in case the servant is prevented from fulfilling his contract for personal services by his own sickness, this is not the fault or act of the master, and while the servant will generally be excused from fulfilling his contract, and be entitled to recover for the labor performed up to the time of his sickness, the master will be entitled to counterclaim his damages for the breach of contract, for which he (the master) was not responsible. The justice of the rule is apparent on a moment's reflection. Id. § 122.

Now, it may well be that McKillop would be justified in quitting if the danger of bodily injury was real and imminent, and the threats of the strikers were so serious that a reasonable man in McKillop's situation would have been justified in believing that he was in imminent danger if he continued to work; for it can hardly be claimed that a man must daily carry his life in his hand in such a manner. Still, this condition of things was a condition for which the master was in no way responsible. If it operated to relieve McKillop from his obligation to work the entire season, still it manifestly could not operate to give him any greater right against his employer than as though he had been relieved of his contract by sickness or vis major, for which his employer was not responsible. It is still the employee, and not the employer, who breaks the contract; and the rule that the party who breaks an entire contract shall have no recovery by reason of his part performance of it is relaxed only to the extent of permitting recovery of compensation for the actual benefit conferred upon the employer, or, as more usually expressed, by allowing the employee the value of his services after deducting the damages, if any, suffered by the employer by reason of the breach of the entire contract. Wood, Mast. & S. § 122; Fenton v. Clark, 11 Vt. 567; Hubbard v. Belden, 27 Vt. 645; Patrick v. Putnam, 27 Vt. 759; Ryan v. Day-ton, 25 Conn. 188, 65 Am. Dec. 560; Wolfe 43 L. R. A.

v. Howes, 20 N. Y. 197-203, 75 Am. Dec. 388; Clark v. Gilbert, 26 N. Y. 279, 84 Am. Dec. 189; Allen v. McKibbin, 5 Mich. 449-455. In the last-cited case (Allen v. McKibbin) the court tersely states the rule as to the measure of recovery thus: "Without reviewing the cases in detail, we think that the only rule which harmonizes them may be laid down substantially as follows: The defaulting plaintiff can in no case recover more than the contract price, and cannot recover that if his work is not reasonably worth it, or if, by paying it, the rest of the work will cost the defendant more than if the whole had been completed under the contract. The party in default can never gain by his default, and the other party can never be permitted to lose by it; and the price thus determined is the true amount recoverable on a quantum meruit." The plaintiff's recovery, then, in the most favorable aspect of the case, is limited to the amount of McKillop's wages at the agreed rate, less any damages resulting to the employer from the termination of the contract. These damages are stipulated and fixed. The language used in the written agreement is apt, and clearly expresses the understanding that the damages recoverable for a termination thereof shall be fifteen days' wages. The consequences of a termination of this contract of employment were eminently of the character to justify stipulation of the damages in advance: Uncertainty as to the possibility and expense of finding another employee, and as to the wages to be paid if one be found; uncertainty as to the extent of interruption or embarrassment of the numerous other employees, joined with the uncertain, but possibly very large, liability to vessel owners or shippers which might be imposed upon defendants by interruption of their work, the apportionment of which damages to each, should several of the contracting employees quit at once, would be extremely difficult and intricate. All these elements bring the situation within the rule adopted in Berrinkott v. Traphagen, 39 Wis. 219, 226. The damages stipulated by the contract equal the amount of plaintiff's demand, and therefore, upon the most favorable view of the evidence, preclude any recovery. A verdict for the defendant should have been directed, and the verdict for the plaintiff should have been set aside.

Although public policy requires that marriages shall not lightly be set aside, yet if one of the parties thereto has been coerced and induced to enter into it by means of duress or fraud, the marriage will be declared null and void. Scott v. Sebright, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 21, 57 L. T. N. S. 421.

A marriage procured by abduction, terror, or fright will be annulled by the court of equity. Ferlat v. Gojon, Hopk. Ch. 478, 14 Am. Dec. 554.

And a consent to a marriage given under actual duress or obtained by force is no consent, and where marriage is obtained under such circumstances it will be declared void, although duress is not a statutory cause for divorce. Willard v. Willard, 6 Baxt. 297, 32 Am. Rep. 529.

So, in Clark v. Field, 13 Vt. 460, which was an action to set aside a marriage upon the ground of fraud, it was stated that the court of chancery, under its common equity jurisdiction, may rescind or relieve against a marriage contract, or annul the contract solemnized before a magistrate or a minister of the gospel if obtained by force, fraud, or imposition, where such marriage had not been followed by consummation or cohabitation.

And it has been held that a marriage effected by fraud or duress, which was never ratified afterward voluntarily by a mind having proper capacity and being free at the time of ratification to act without fear or force, is void ab initio. Hampstead v. Plaistow, 49 N. H. 84.

The general rule, however, seems to be that where the marriage was celebrated according to forms of law, it is prima facie valid, and the burden rests with the person attacking its validity to establish the invalidity, and the husband, in an action against the wife to annul the marriage on the ground of force and duress, cannot therefore be allowed to testify against her, 43 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Calcasieu in favor of defendant in an action brought to obtain the annulment of a marriage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Schwing &amp; Moore, for appellant:

Marriage is a civil contract.

Rev. Civ. Code, art. 86.

Want of free consent is cause for annulling a marriage.

Rev. Civ. Code, art. 91, No. 2, 1772, No. 2.

Consent obtained by means of violence, threats, or intimidation is not valid, and contracts based upon such consent, not legal.

Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 1819, 1850, 1852, 1853, 1857, 1859, 1881, 1882; Lacoste v. Guidroz, 47 La. Ann. 296.

Mr. R. L. Belden for appellee.

In the absence of a statute authorizing it. Bassett v. Bassett, 9 Bush, 696.

A husband on whose behalf an action is brought to set aside his marriage on the ground that it was forced upon him by violence and under fear on his part of a threatened prosecution for a felony which he had not committed cannot stand before the court as prima facie unmarried, and be permitted to testify as to the fact of the marriage and the circumstances leading up to his apparent consent, until the validity of the marriage shall have been judicially declared. Lacoste v. Guidroz, 47 La. Ann. 295.

And a wife will be allowed alimony pendente lite in an action brought by her husband to annul their marriage on the ground that the husband was compelled by duress to enter into the contract, where she denies any participation in or knowledge of the alleged duress. Vroom v. Marsh, 29 N. J. Eq. 15.

The fact that the consent of the mother of a minor to his marriage was obtained by force and violence would not have the effect of invalidating it. Lacoste v. Guidroz, 47 La. Ann. 295.

II. *What duress is sufficient.*a. Generally.

The question whether a party to a marriage was coerced or acted willingly is one of fact in an action to annul the marriage. Schwartz v. Schwartz, 29 Ill. App. 516.

And the force or coercion for which a marriage may be annulled must be such as to compel the party to act against his will. There must be actual force by imprisonment, or putting in fear, or such threatening of life or of great bodily harm, as amounts to duress per minas. Stevenson v. Stevenson, 7 Phila. 386.

And to make out a defense of duress in an action to annul a marriage, it must appear that the party's actions had been influenced by the restraint. Schwartz v. Schwartz, 29 Ill. App. 516.

But it is not necessary that coercion or force to induce a marriage should be such as a person of ordinary physical and mental stability would be capable of resisting; if either party is mentally incapable of resisting improper pressure, there is no consent such as the law requires, for the contracting of a valid marriage. Scott v. Sebright, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 21, 57 L. T. N. S. 421.

Watkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of this suit is to obtain a judgment decreeing the ceremony of marriage between the plaintiff and defendant ab initio null and void, and that they were never married to each other, and further decreeing that no community or other marital rights ever resulted from the ceremony of marriage which was performed between them, their legal status of unmarried persons never having been thereby changed or affected.

The allegation of the petitioner is "that on the 10th of June, 1897, he was compelled by force and threats to procure a [marriage] license and go before John L. Wasey, justice of the peace at Lake Charles, La., and there, under threats, to go through the ceremony of marriage with [the defendant]." He avers that he had never promised said Margaret Ryan to marry her, and that she had no legal or just ground to demand of him that he should marry her, and that one George W. Ryan, an uncle of the defendant, commanded him to marry her under penalty of death; said Ryan being aided, abetted, and assisted by several other male relatives of the said defendant, while petitioner was at the same time protesting against this exercise of force and duress. And he further avers that, notwithstanding his unwillingness to marry her, and repugnance to said marriage, and his protestations to them that Margaret Ryan had no claims upon him whatever, said George W. Ryan and his associates forced him, under fear of death, to go to the clerk's office and take out a marriage license to marry her, and forced him to go before said justice of the peace, and there, in the presence of said persons, to go through the marriage ceremony; said justice of the peace and the said Margaret Ryan being at the time fully aware that he was acting under duress and violence and alto-

b. Threats.

Threats of any measure authorized by law and the circumstances of the case pursuant to which a marriage is obtained will not constitute such duress as will avoid it. Lacoste v. Guidros, 47 La. Ann. 295.

A marriage induced by threats of arrest and imprisonment, not based upon a false and invalid charge, but as a proper legal remedy to redress or punish a wrong, will not be set aside and annulled as having been procured by duress. Brant v. Brant, 17 Phila. 655.

And in order to justify a divorce under Pa. Code of May 8, 1854, providing that a divorce may be granted where the alleged marriage was procured by threats, force, and coercion and has not been subsequently confirmed, it must appear that the threats were such threats against life or to do bodily harm as would overrule the judgment and coerce the will. Todd v. Todd, 149 Pa. 60, 17 L. R. A. 820.

Thus, a petition in an action to annul a marriage, alleging that it was brought about by force and duress, and that the man at the time of its celebration was held in unlawful custody and compelled to act alone by fear of death, or great bodily harm, which fear was superinduced by the threats and conduct of the brother of the woman, and that he repudiated the supposed marriage and parted from her as soon as he was restored to liberty, is sufficient on demurrer to present a cause of action within the jurisdiction of the court, though it calls for relief in the way of a divorce instead of a judgment declaring the marriage void. Bassett v. Bassett, 9 Bush, 696.

So, a marriage between a man and a girl of sixteen, consummated after her rejection of his attentions, upon which he threatened to blow out her brains if she would not marry him and produced a pistol which he held to her head, upon which she promised to marry him upon condition that he put away the pistol, and a few days afterwards he intercepted her while on a railway journey and took her to the office of the registrar of marriages and married her, she having fainted during the ceremony and left him as soon as it was over, will be pronounced null and void, the marriage never having been ratified, and the man never insisting on his marital rights. Bartlett v. Rice, 72 L. T. N. S. 122.

And a marriage between a man and woman of less than usual mental stability, brought about by a conspiracy on his part, pursuant to which he induced her to sign bills, and caused her to be harassed and persecuted to the verge of despair on account thereof, leading her to believe that she would become bankrupt if she did not marry him and perhaps be imprisoned, whereby she became so reduced by mental and bodily suffering as to be incapable of offering resistance to the threats, which in her normal condition she would have turned from with contempt, he having taken her to the registrar's office and told her that he was going to marry her and would shoot her if she showed any signs before the registrar that she was not acting of her own free will, which marriage was never consummated, will be set aside as wholly void. Scott v. Sebright, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 21, 57 L. T. N. S. 421.

So, a marriage between a young man and a girl to which she did not actually consent but went through the ceremony believing it to be only a betrothal, while so much under the influence of her mother, who was a strong-minded woman, favorable to the marriage, that she was not a free agent, will be decreed null and void on application of the girl, where the marriage was never consummated. Ford v. Stier [1896] P. 1, 73 L. T. N. S. 632, 65 L. J. Prob. N. S. 13.

A marriage between two cousins upon the threat of the man that if the woman would not marry him he would blow out his brains, and that she would be responsible, however, will not be set aside on the ground of duress where the magistrate, who performed the ceremony, stated that the woman went through it without any signs of unwillingness, and signed the register in a clear, firm hand, though the marriage was never consummated, and the man admitted that he had only married her for her money, and there was evidence that the woman was of a weak, impressionable character. Cooper v. Crane [1891] P. 369.

In the above case, Scott v. Sebright, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 21, 57 L. T. N. S. 421, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in this case there was no threat of violence to the lady herself or any such infamy as was alleged in that case, and no evidence of prostration, mental or physical, in the lady, or of actual violence at the time of the ceremony.

And in Field's Marriage Annuling Bill, 2 H. L. Cas. 48, which was an application to the legislature to annul a marriage in which it appeared that the man persecuted the girl, who was about eighteen years of age, with his attentions, and upon her refusal to marry him and her confession that her affections were centered upon another, told her that she would never marry the other, that he would not harm gether against his will, in submitting to said marriage ceremony. He further alleges that immediately after the completion of said marriage ceremony he withdrew as soon as he was released from said coercion and duress, without saying one word to Margaret Ryan, protesting that said ceremony and proceedings were against his will, without his consent, and under duress and fear of instant death and has ever since continually remained away from her, and refused to consummate the marriage by cohabiting with her. Therefore petitioner avers that said marriage ceremony and other proceedings were violations of law, against his consent, her, but threatened mischief to the object of her attachment and also threatened to kill himself, upon which she promised to marry him, but afterward withdrew the promise, but subsequently was prevailed upon to renew it, which was followed by their marriage, but there was no cohabitation or consummation of the marriage, the legislature refused to annul it on the ground that it did not appear that it was not solemnized with her free consent.

So, where a man marries a woman under threats of prosecution for bastardy, and through fear of loss of reputation and character or imprisonment, the marriage is invalid, and will be set aside on his application, if the charges made against him were in fact false, and he never confirmed or recognized the marriage after it was entered into. Brant v. Brant, 17 Phila. 655.

And a complaint in an action to annul a marriage alleging that the woman represented herself as with child by the complainant, and that her father and mother threatened to have him arrested for fornication and bastardy unless he would marry her at once, and that in consequence of such threats of violence and fraudulent charges, and through fear of loss of reputation and character and fear of imprisonment, he did, against his will and choice, marry her, and that he was never guilty of sexual intercourse with her either before or after the marriage, is good on demurrer. Ibid. And see COLLINS v. RYAN.

But threatening to inflict bodily harm upon a person unless he marries another will not entitle him to a divorce where he marries her, but does so for other reasons, and not because he was coerced by force. Todd v. Todd, 149 Pa. 60, 17 L. R. A. 320.

And proof in an action for divorce that a woman stated to some of her friends that she was pregnant by the man, which statement was false, and that he did not know her at the time, but that he was induced to marry her thereby, is not sufficient to establish coercion or duress forcing him into the marriage contract, which will authorize its dissolution, in the absence of force or fear of bodily harm. Hoffman v. Hoffman, 30 Pa. 417.

So, to justify the annulment of a marriage upon the ground that the alleged husband consented through fear of imprisonment and bodily harm threatened to be inflicted upon him, it should appear that the duress was occasioned by the woman, and that she uttered or instigated the threats of imprisonment or bodily harm, or was cognizant of them, or at least that at the time of the marriage she knew or had reason to believe that the plaintiff was impelled to marry her through fear that the threats of imprisonment and bodily harm would be carried into execution if he did not do so. Sherman v. Sherman, 47 N. Y. S. R. 404.

under force, duress, and compulsion, and cannot, in law, produce any legal results.

The answer of the defendant is a general denial.

After due proceedings and trial there was a judgment pronounced against the plaintiff, rejecting his demands, and he prosecutes this appeal therefrom.

One of the plaintiff's witnesses testified that about three hours previous to the marriage he told the plaintiff that he had seduced the defendant, his niece, and had to marry her, and that his reply was "to give him a little time, and he would do what was honorable by her"; that two or three hours however, it was held that a husband is entitled to a decree to annul and set aside his marriage on the ground of force and duress, though it does not appear that the wife was guilty of any force or duress, where the proof goes to show that her friends and relatives did by threats and duress compel him to enter into the marriage contract.

Where it appears in an action to annul a marriage on the ground of coercion that at the time of its celebration no violence or threats were brought to bear upon the husband, but that he willingly gave his consent and signed the wedding certificate, the court will hold him to proof that in order to obtain his consent forms of law were used to cover coercion. Lacoste v. Guldros, 47 La. Ann. 295.

So, in Leavitt v. Leavitt, 18 Mich. 452, which was an action to annul a marriage on the ground of fraud, it was said that the common cases of fraud which will invalidate a marriage are duress, surprise, or stratagem in procuring the marriage, and the fraud must usually be nearly, if not absolutely, coincident in time with the marriage, and operate to destroy the intelligent consent which is required for the marriage itself, rather than the preliminary engagement.

For cases of threats in connection with arrest and imprisonment, see next subdivision.

c. Arrest or imprisonment.

A lawful arrest or imprisonment properly caused for the purpose of redressing a wrong cannot amount to duress which will avoid a marriage.

Thus, if a man lawfully arrested on the process for seduction marries the woman to procure his discharge, he cannot have the marriage avoided upon the ground of duress. Marvin v. Marvin, 52 Ark. 425; Honnett v. Honnett, 33 Ark. 156, 34 Am. Rep. 39; Lacoste v. Guldros, 47 La. Ann. 295; State v. Davis, 79 N. C. 603; Johns v. Johns, 44 Tex. 40; Copeland v. Copeland (Va.) 21 S. E. 241.

In the absence of any force or direct fear of bodily harm at the time of the marriage. Honnett v. Honnett, 33 Ark. 156, 34 Am. Rep. 39; Copeland v. Copeland (Va.) 21 S. E. 241.

And a marriage consummated while the man is under arrest for seducing the woman, and on the advice of the officer who arrested him and the justice before whom he was brought, that by marrying her he would be relieved from further prosecution, is valid, and cannot be annulled on the ground that it was consummated under duress. Johns v. Johns, 44 Tex. 40.

Nor will a marriage by a man under twenty-one years of age, while under arrest upon the charge of seducing a minor under promise of marriage, be annulled on the ground of duress because the magistrate read a portion of the law to him and told him if he did not marry the afterwards he happened to meet the plaintiff at the railroad depot, just as he was about to board the train, and "stopped him, and told him to come back to town, and fulfil the promise he had made me." The witness said he did not threaten plaintiff with violence, but that "he insisted upon his going back with him." He said he stayed with him until he married the defendant; that he stayed with him for the purpose of seeing that he married her. He said that he used no force, but told him he had to marry the defendant; that it was his privilege to marry her or not, but that he "intended to do everything [he could] to make him marry her." He states that he accompanied him to the clerk's office to procure a marriage license; that plaintiff asked him "to go and get John Wasey [the justice of the peace], and he went to Wasey's boarding house after him. He states that "after he told me he would do what was honorable by [the defendant], he did not stay with him; but it was several hours afterwards before he saw him again." There were only five present at the ceremony, in addition to woman he would be obliged to confine him, unless he gave bail in an amount which was excessive, though she was a prostitute of the lowest order and they never afterward cohabited. Seyer v. Seyer, 37 N. J. Eq. 210.

And a fraudulent contract for which a divorce is authorized in Connecticut implies a cause of divorce which existed previous to the marriage, and such a one as rendered the marriage unlawful ab initio, as consanguinity, corporal imbecility, and the like, but does not include the claim of invalidity of the marriage through duress, it having been entered into on the claim of the woman that the man had seduced her under promise of marriage and while he was under arrest therefor. Benton v. Benton, 1 Day, 111.

So, the fact that a man was under arrest as the putative father of a bastard child at the time he was married to the mother of the child, is not enough to avoid the contract of marriage on the ground of duress. Jackson, Dies, v. Winne, 7 Wend. 47; Lacoste v. Guldros, 47 La. Ann. 295.

If a single man who is under lawful arrest under a bona fide regular proceeding in bastardy on examination of a single woman, wishes, as a means of avoiding the legitimate consequences of the proceeding, to marry her, he cannot be permitted to relieve himself of the obligations which he assumes merely on the ground that at the time of the marriage he was under duress. Sickles v. Carson, 26 N. J. Eq. 440.

Where a man has been guilty of illicit intercourse with a woman, and supposed her to be pregnant as a result thereof, furnishes her with the means to commit abortion for the purpose of preventing the birth of the offspring, and criminal proceedings are regularly and lawfully instituted against him for the latter offense, and being under arrest therefor he chooses, as a means of release, to marry the woman, the circumstances under which he enters into the marriage constitute no ground for annulling it. Frost v. Frost, 42 N. J. Eq. 55.

A man having a wife living, who marries another woman while under arrest for her seduction upon being informed that the prosecution would be discontinued if he married her, cannot claim that the second marriage was procured by compulsion or duress in a prosecution for bigamy, where the statutes expressly provide that he may under such circumstances marry the girl alleged to have been seduced. Medrano v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 214.

And a marriage contract through fear of imprisonment is not void so as to relieve a party to the marriage from the prosecution for bigamy on account of a subsequent marriage when the force was not imposed as an inducement to the marriage, but arose from the arrest and prosecution of the party for bastardy, and the marriage was entered into to escape the consequences. Williams v. State, 44 Ala. 24.

But evidence of a marriage ceremony while the man in question was under arrest upon a charge of bastardy, and that he was told by the constable who arrested him that he would have to marry the woman or go to the penitentiary, and that when the ceremony was over he left her and refused to have anything to do with her, and that the license upon which the marriage was based was issued by a deputy clerk unauthorized to issue such licenses, is not sufficient to establish a prior marriage so as to support a charge of bigamy based upon a second marriage by the same man. Kopke v. People, 43 Mich. 41.

A marriage procured while a man was under arrest on process for bastardy or seduction, for the purpose of securing his discharge therefrom, however, will be set aside on his application, where the process of arrest was void and the imprisonment unlawful, and he married for the purpose of regaining his liberty. Lacoste v. Guldros, 47 La. Ann. 295.

And if an officer arrests a man for bastardy, not having a warrant which the law requires, and, to avoid imprisonment, he goes through with the form of marriage with the woman and then leaves her, the marriage will be declared void. James v. Smith, Supreme Judicial Court Mass. 1861, Reported in Bishop, Marr. Div. & Sep. § 544.

And an arrest and imprisonment under a void process or under a warrant issued upon a charge by a woman against a man that she was pregnant by him, which was false and which caused the man to marry her, the proceedings having been set on foot by her, will authorize a divorce on his behalf under the Pennsylvania statute upon the ground that the marriage was obtained by duress. Collins v. Collins, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 515.

So, a marriage between a lad sixteen years old and a woman much older of bad repute for chastity will be held void on the ground that it was procured by duress, where he never had sexual intercourse with her before or after the performance of the ceremony, and never cohabited or lived with her, and it was performed while he was under arrest at her instance in bastardy proceedings, and was actually confined, and was told by the officer that he must get bail or go to jail, and his father advised him to marry her. Shoro v. Shoro, 60 Vt. 268.

And a boy eighteen years old, who had seen little of the world and who was arrested on a charge of bastardy made by a woman and brought before a justice, who told him he had better marry her and that she had every advantage of him, and that he would be sent to prison, and who continued to press his advice upon him, though he protested his innocence, until he was induced to stand up with the woman and go through the marriage ceremony without an opportunity to consult his friends, is entitled to have the marriage annulled. Smith v. Smith, 51 Mich. 607.

The conclusion of coercion is not a necessary and unavoidable one, however, from the fact of the parties and the justice of the peace. On cross-examination the following occurred, viz.:

Q. Did Collins at any time refuse to marry this girl?

A. No, sir.

Q. When you went to the house of Mr. Stoddard,—the place where the ceremony took place,—were there any threats [made] against him?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he not go through the marriage ceremony willingly?

A. I was not in the house when it went on.

Q. You did not see any violence toward him, did you?

A. No, sir.

Q. If he had persisted in not marrying her, could he not have done as he wanted to?

A. I think he could.

Q. Did he appear to be frightened?

A. He did not seem so.

Q. Did Collins call for a marriage license?

A. Yes, sir. He asked Mr. Gosset to issue it.

Q. At the time Mr. Gosset was issuing the license, was there any trouble between Collins and you?

A. No, sir. I did not go into the court house until afterwards.

Another witness of the plaintiff states that after the parties had assembled at the place where the wedding was to take place, "the lady walked in, and sat down, and nobody said a word for perhaps half a minute. Then Mr. Wasey motioned to Ben [the plaintiff] to know if that was the lady, and he said or motioned that it was. Then Wasey told them to get up, and join hands, and go through the ceremony." That he "does not think anything at all was said after the unlawful restraint. Schwartz v. Schwartz, 29 Ill. App. 516.

And the fact that a warrant under which a man charged with seduction was arrested in another state at the instance of the father of the girl alleged to have been seduced was unauthorized by the statutes of that state will not establish duress of imprisonment which will invalidate a marriage had while under arrest where it appears that the prosecutor was acting in good faith and pursuing legal remedies which he was advised to pursue by one whom he supposed to be a competent lawyer. Schwartz v. Schwartz, 29 Ill. App. 516.

And the validity of a marriage between a man under arrest upon a charge of seduction and the woman alleged to have been seduced is not affected by the fact that he was under arrest through the arrest was unlawful, and though coercion was used by the father of the girl, where the girl herself had no purpose to coerce or force him into the marriage nor knew of any such purpose on the part of her father. Ibid.

So, where the court, in an action to annul a marriage, is satisfied that actual intercourse had taken place between the parties the charge of threat, or unlawful menace, or fraud, or duress must be most fully and satisfactorily established before the court will annul a marriage. Seyer v. Seyer, 37 N. J. Eq. 210.

And the subsequent discovery by a man who marries to secure his discharge while under lawful arrest on process for seduction, that he could not have been convicted, will not enable him to procure the annulment of the marriage where the prosecution was upon probable cause, and not merely from malice. Marvin v. Marvin, 52 Ark. 425.

And one who, knowing that he cannot be the father of a bastard child, is induced to marry the mother to avoid prosecution for bastardy, is not in a position to annul the marriage contract on the ground of threat and coercion, though he should afterward be able to establish the fact that the child was not his. Scott v. Shufeldt, 5 Paige, 43.

But a white man under arrest as the putative father of a bastard child of a white woman, who, believing the child to be his, marries her to obtain his discharge, after which he ascertains that the child was a mulatto, and that she knew that fact at the time she swore it to be his, having then been delivered and seen the child, is entitled to a decree declaring the marriage contract void on the ground of fraud. Ibid.

So, a marriage by a man under arrest for seducing a minor under promise of marriage will not be set aside on the ground of duress on the allegation that the woman was over twenty-one years of age, where, if such was the fact, he knew it at the time of the marriage. Seyer v. Seyer, 37 N. J. Eq. 210.

III. Ratification.

A marriage effected by force or duress may be made good at the election of the injured party, who, after being set free from the influence of the fear or duress, may ratify and confirm the contract, though the other party cannot avoid it by taking advantage of his own wrong. Hampstead v. Plaistow, 49 N. H. 84.

Thus, the voluntary cohabitation by parties to a marriage obtained by duress after the force or cause of fear is removed is a sufficient ratification thereof to render it valid. Ibid.

And a marriage between a man and woman while the man was under arrest upon a charge of fornication and bastardy while he was unable to get bail, if voidable on the ground of duress, will be deemed to have been ratified by him where he lived with her in marital cohabitation for three weeks after he was released from prison and after the marriage took place, while he was no longer in danger of prosecution for bastardy. Richards v. Richards, 14 Lane. L. Rev. 286.

And one who was arrested in a distant state on the charge of seduction under promise of marriage, and thereafter married the woman alleged to have been seduced, and returned with her to her home, occupying the same berth in the sleeper, and occupying the same room with her upon their arrival, and who introduced her to a relative as his wife and never challenged the validity of the marriage or denied his consent until the wife filed a bill for separate maintenance, will be deemed to have ratified the marriage, though the warrant under which he was arrested may have been unauthorized, and though it is claimed that he came home under compulsion from the father of the girl. Schwartz v. Schwartz, 29 Ill. App. 516.

And a marriage between a guardian and his ward of tender years, while they were traveling abroad, after she had wished she was home again, upon which he had threatened that he would kill himself if she went home, after which ceremony." That immediately after the ceremony the plaintiff accompanied witness and others down town, and, if any conversation took place after the ceremony he did not hear it. On cross-examination the following occurred, viz.:

Q. You say you were present at that marriage. Did plaintiff answer any of the questions put to him during the ceremony by Mr. Wusey?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Answer them without any objection?

A. He simply said, "I do," when asked if he would take the lady for his wife. He did not state any objections during the ceremony.

Another witness made a statement similar to that of the first one interrogated, and confirmed his testimony to the effect that they traveled together from place to place and finally she signed a declaration falsely stating her age, parentage, and guardianship, and married him, and afterward continued traveling from place to place with him until they were pursued by other guardians who had been informed of the marriage, will not be decreed null, where she was of the age of consent. Harford v. Morris, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 423.

So, it has been held that the subsequent cohabitation of the parties to a marriage alleged to have been obtained by duress may be looked to by the jury as a circumstance of the case, in determining in their own minds whether the marriage was valid or not, but that cohabitation of itself would not render a void marriage valid, though it is evidence of marriage. Williams v. State, 44 Ala. 24.

The subsequent consent of a woman forcibly carried away and married will not excuse the offense of carrying her away. Queen v. Swanson, 7 Mod. 101.

IV. Matters of procedure.

Matters of procedure in actions to annul a marriage for duress or other cause in the absence of special statutory provision therefor seem to be governed by the rules of practice in divorce cases.

Under N. Y. Rev. Stat. 243, § 30, providing that the marriage may be annulled on the ground that the consent of one of the parties was obtained by force or threat, during the lifetime of the parties or one of them, a suit can only be brought by the party whose consent was obtained by force or threat, or by some person who had an interest in contesting the validity of the marriage during the lifetime of the parties to the marriage, or during the lifetime of one of these parties, and not afterward, and a suit may not be brought at any distance of time after the right to institute it occurred, provided either party is still alive. Montgomery v. Montgomery, 3 Barb. Ch. 132.

Minors who have contracted marriage are authorized to stand in judgment in an action to annul it upon the ground of coercion without the intervention of their tutors. Lacoste v. Guidroz, 47 La. Ann. 295.

And a complainant in an action to set aside a marriage upon the ground that it was procured by threats and duress and by fraud and coercion, is insufficient where there is nothing to plaintiff professed a willingness to do what was right by the girl. Aside from the testimony we have quoted, there are a great many details of similar character and import; and all of them, taken together, have given us the impression that originally it was neither the purpose nor expectation of the plaintiff to marry the defendant, but the relations of the defendant insisted upon the plaintiff marrying the girl, believing that he had seduced and ruined her, and that to marry her was his duty under the circumstances; that, upon due consideration of the pressure which was brought to bear upon him, and of his duty to repair a wrong he had confessedly done the girl, he yielded a reluctant and passive consent to the performance of a marriage ceremony. We are of opinion that he has not presented a case which entitles him to relief.

show what threats were made or what duress or force were used, so that the court can see whether or not they constitute a cause for annulment of the marriage. Shriver v. Shriver, 14 Phila. 170; Hoffman v. Hoffman, 30 Pa. 417.

So, all the rules for requiring evidence of bona fides in an application for divorce to secure the court against imposition in such cases apply equally to actions to annul a contract of marriage, and it should be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court in such an action based upon an allegation of duress that the proceeding is not the result of collusion between the parties. Sickles v. Carson, 26 N. J. Eq. 440.

And a divorce will not be granted upon the ground that the marriage was obtained by duress upon the unsupported testimony of the complainant that the marriage was performed while he was under arrest upon the charge of seducing the woman he married under promise of marriage, upon being told if he did not marry her he would be imprisoned, where at the time of his arrest he made no denial of the complaint. Pyle v. Pyle, 10 Phila. 58.

And there must be a preponderance of evidence against the decision of a trial court which personally heard the testimony in an action for the annulment of a marriage upon the ground that it was obtained by force and duress in favor of such annulment to authorize an appellate court to reverse it upon appeal. Anderson v. Anderson, 74 Hun. 56.

And a verdict in an action for the annulment of a marriage will be set aside as against the weight of evidence where it is based upon the unsupported testimony of the complainant to the effect that he was compelled to marry under threats to take his life, where the marriage took place in the presence of the wife's family and two ladies who were in the house temporarily and a well-known and highly respected magistrate, all of whom contradicted the complainant on the question of force and coercion. Stevenson v. Stevenson, 7 Phila. 386.

A copy of a marriage record in one state, made under a statute applying only to residents of that state is not conclusive upon the courts of another state so as to preclude proof in the latter state, in an action for alimony, that the marriage was performed while the husband was under duress, and that he had not ratified it since in any of the methods recognized by law as sufficient for that purpose. Miller v. Miller, 43 S. C. 306.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Solomon NATHAN, Exr., etc., of Samuel Strasburger, Deceased, et al., Apts.,
v.

Edwin M. LEE, Receiver of G. Y. Roots Company.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A real-estate mortgage made by a foreign corporation to nonresident creditors to secure a bona fide antecedent debt may be held valid in the state where the land is, when it is not prohibited by the statutes of the state in which the corporation and the creditors reside, although the judicial decisions in that state hold such a mortgage to be an unlawful preference.
2. The fact that creditors are nonresidents will not affect the question of the validity of a mortgage made to them as against other creditors.

(February 24, 1899.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dearborn County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to set aside certain mortgages and assignment deeds which have been executed by G. Y. Roots Company as giving an unlawful preference in an assignment for creditors and to have the property covered thereby subjected to the claims of creditors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles H. Stephens, G. H. Wald, and Ledyard Lincoln, for appellants:

The law of Ohio does not prevent an insolvent corporation from preferring one creditor to the exclusion of another.

Damarin v. Huron Iron Co. 47 Ohio St. 581; Cross v. Carstens, 49 Ohio St. 548.

A manufacturing corporation (such as this was) has the power to borrow money and secure its repayment by mortgage.

Burt v. Rattle, 31 Ohio St. 116.

To repay or secure the repayment of money borrowed by the corporation, especially if borrowed under promise to give security, is certainly one of "the legitimate objects of its creation" spoken of in § 5266, Ohio Rev. Stat. even though the corporation be at the time insolvent.

Damarin v. Huron Iron Co. 47 Ohio St. 581; First Nat. Bank v. Dovetail Body & Gear Co. 143 Ind. 550.

The agreement for security makes the mortgages executed pursuant thereto valid.

Campbell Printing Press & Mfg. Co. v. Bellman Bros. 11 Ohio C. C. 360.

An execution creditor cannot question a sale of property made by his debtor, merely because that contract of sale is within the statute of frauds.

The decision of the supreme court of Ohio in the Rouse Case, 46 Ohio St. 493, 5 L. R. A. 378, cannot, in any view, be of greater force in this case than would be an act of the legislature of Ohio declaring that all preferences made by incorporated companies under the circumstances existing in this case should be null and void. Yet it is held that such statutes have no extra-territorial force.

Messrs. Roberts & Stapp, Thornton M. Hinkle, and Frederick W. Hinkle, for appellee:

The case now before the court is one in which the law of the corporation state in the corporation's insolvency is in question. For the true principle we should look to that line of authority wherein is decided the effect of the laws of the corporation state in cases of insolvency, bankruptcy, assignment for creditors, etc.

The power of a corporation to act in a foreign country or in another state depends upon the law of the country of its creation, and on the law of the place where it assumes to act.

American Waterworks Co. v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 46 Am. St. Rep. 288, note, 20 Colo. 203, 25 L. R. A. 338.

There is a line of cases where the question has been as to what effect some general statute or state rule of corporate power, not expressly a part of the charter, yet of a limiting nature, should have when sought to be invoked.

As to this line there is always present a very important element which distinguishes some from others, and that is the particular citizenship of the party to be affected by the application of such limit of corporate power. That is, the persons against whom the general statute or rule of corporate power of the foreign state is sought to be invoked is in one case a citizen of the corporation state while in another case he is not.

Warren v. First Nat. Bank, 149 Ill. 9, 27 L. R. A. 746; Hoyt v. Thompson, 19 N. Y. 207; First Nat. Bank v. Dovetail Body & Gear Co. 143 Ind. 550.

The charter of a corporation, with such modifications as may be made by the legislative power of the state, or as may result from the decisions of its highest court, construing the same, forms a contract between the corporation on the one part and the state on the other.

Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 209.

Every other state recognizes this right of the parent state to control, and also recognizes the contractual relation mentioned.

The power of a foreign corporation must depend, first, on the laws of the state creating it, and second, on the laws of the state where the power is sought to be exercised. Such power cannot extend beyond the privileges given by the first, nor can it override the prohibitions adopted by the latter.

Citizenship is controlling in the various decisions.

Re Waite, 99 N. Y. 433; Barnett v. Kinney, 147 U. S. 476, 37 L. ed. 247.

The law of Ohio which created the G. Y. Roots Company by positive rule of its highest court, and which rule became a part of its incorporation law, said and decreed that upon the insolvency, failure, and ceasing of business of said company, its property ipso facto became a trust fund, and its officers mere trustees for creditors without power to prefer.

A positive and express trust was thus effected, and the trust was certainly binding on the appellants, who were citizens of Ohio and bound to know its law, and who knew of that condition of the company which under such laws was requisite to such trust relation.

Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148, 3 L. ed. 181; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 712, 713; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 25; Perry, Tr. 3d ed. §§ 70-73; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 743, 744; Chew v. Brumagen, 13 Wall. 497, 20 L. ed. 663.

The law of Ohio, acting upon the persons of the officers of one of its own corporations, converted them eo instanti into trustees of all the corporate property, and so acting deprived them of power to act otherwise than as such trustees.

The rule of the lex rei sitæ would not be applicable here.

The scope of the agency of corporate officers must be fixed by the law of the state creating the corporation, and whether or not there is sufficient authority within the scope of such agency for such officers to make a mortgage depends upon the law of the creating state.

It was the peculiar province of the highest court in Ohio to construe the corporation laws and rights of corporations and the powers of corporate officers of that state, and principles of state comity require other states to give to that construction binding weight, when to do so will not conflict with the rights of citizens of such other states.

Jessup v. Carnegie, 80 N. Y. 441, 36 Am. Rep. 643; Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. 152, 6 L. ed. 289; Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. 367, 6 L. ed. 496.

There is a vast difference between the corporation as a legal entity and the officers or directors. The latter are not the corporation and have no common-law powers. They are simply agents and no more.

3 Thomp. Corp. §§ 3968, 3970-3972.

Whether a contract affecting lands is within the statute of frauds or is void for ambiguity or uncertainty is not a question going to inherent or permissive power to contract, but is one relating to the necessary and legal evidence of the contract, and the formality by which the contract to be enforceable must be surrounded.

Saltmarsh v. Spaulding, 147 Mass. 224.

Under Indiana law the agreement to give security was within the statute of frauds.

Where the proceeding is one which goes to the very existence of the trust, that is, where the question is as to whether in fact any valid trust was created, then the adjudication in order to be binding on the beneficiaries of the trust must be an adjudication in which the beneficiaries or some of them, in behalf of themselves and others, are parties and before the court, or one which is actively litigated by the assignee.

Smith v. Gaines, 39 N. J. Eq. 545.

Even though the deed of assignment itself should have declared a preference, such preference would not be upheld when rights of Indiana creditors to Indiana property are concerned, unless such preference was given a sufficient time before the assignment so as not to be in reality a part of one and the same transaction.

Jordan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee is the receiver of the G. Y. Roots Company, a foreign corporation incorporated under the laws of the state of Ohio; and prior to the suspension of its business, as hereinafter stated, its principal office was located in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio. The purpose for which this corporation was created was to manufacture, purchase, and deal in flour, grain, salt, and other merchandise, for profit. To further the object of its incorporation, it became the owner of and operated a large flouring mill and cooper shops, situated on certain described real estate in the city of Lawrenceburg, Dearborn county, Indiana. In 1893 Samuel Strasburger, a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio, loaned to this company at different times money amounting in the aggregate to $14,000 and over. This money was used by the company in carrying on its business. These several loans were evidenced by certain promissory notes executed by said company to Strasburger in 1893, payable to him at the city of Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1894 the company also borrowed of Rosa E. Levi, a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio, and one of the appellants in this appeal, money to the amount of $5,000, which was also used by the company in its business; and for the several sums so loaned by her the company executed its promissory notes, payable to her at Cincinnati, Ohio. On August 6, 1895, these notes of Strasburger and Levi were unpaid; and on that day the G. Y. Roots Company was insolvent, having contracted debts and liabilities amounting to $400,000, while its assets at the same time amounted in value to $140,000. On said day it had virtually ceased to be a going concern, but was still in the possession and control of all of its property, but contemplated making a voluntary assignment for the benefit of its creditors. On the said 6th day of August, at its office at Cincinnati, Ohio, in order to secure the payment of the notes held by Strasburger and Levi for the money loaned, the company, by order of its board of directors, executed to each of these two creditors a mortgage upon its real estate on which its mills and shops were situated in Lawrenceburg, Dearborn county, Indiana. These mortgages were in accordance with the form prescribed by the laws of Indiana, and were duly recorded, after their execution and acknowledgment, in the recorder's office of said Dearborn county, on said 6th day of August, 1895. On the same day, after the execution of these mortgages, this company, under the insolvent laws of the state of Ohio, made what purported to be a voluntary assignment to Edwin M. Lee, as its assignee, of all of its property. It also on the same day executed a special deed of conveyance, wherein it was recited that the said company conveyed and warranted to Edwin M. Lee its real estate (describing it), situated in Lawrenceburg, Dearborn county, Indiana, to be held by him in trust for the benefit of its creditors; the real estate described in this latter deed being the same which the company had previously mortgaged to Strasburger and Levi. On February 22, 1896, in an action instituted by certain creditors of this company in the circuit court of Dearborn county, Indiana, appellee, Lee, was by said court appointed receiver of the said insolvent company, and duly qualified as such; and thereupon, by permission of that court, he instituted this action therein, making Strasburger (then in life) and Levi, together with the said G. Y. Roots Company and its said assignee under its general and special assignments, parties defendant to the action. The receiver by his action invoked the judgment of the court in his favor as follows: First, to set aside the mortgages executed by the said company on August 6, 1895, to Strasburger and Levi; second, to set aside and have declared null and void the two assignment deeds heretofore mentioned, made by the company on the said 6th day of August, so far as the same, or either of them, sought to assign or transfer the property of the company situated in Dearborn county, Indiana; third, that the court order the said Dearborn county real estate sold, freed from the said mortgage liens, and, in the event the said liens should be held valid, that the same attach to the proceeds arising out of the sale of the said mortgaged premises, etc. All the parties appeared to this action and filed their answers thereto, and the matters and things involved under the issues so joined were submitted to the court for its judgment. The only question, however, which the court adjudicated upon this complaint of the receiver, was that which related to the validity of the deed of assignment, so far as the same affected the property situated in Dearborn county, Indiana, and embraced in the mortgages of Strasburger and Levi. Upon this question the court found and adjudged that the said deeds of assignment were invalid, and did not convey any right, title, or interest to the assignee in or to the property of the company situated in Dearborn county, Indiana, and further decreed that the said deeds of assignment be set aside and held for naught, and that the title to the said property be held to be as fully and effectually in said company at the time of the appointment of the receiver by the Dearborn circuit court as if such deeds of assignment had not been made. After the rendition of this judgment, Strasburger and Levi each filed a cross-complaint in the said action against the receiver, wherein they set up the notes which each held against the said Roots Company, and also the mortgage executed by it to each of the cross complainants on the 6th day of August, 1895, to secure the payment of said indebtedness. The relief which each sought by their respective cross-complaints was to enforce the mortgage lien against the proceeds arising out of the sale by the receiver of the mortgaged premises, and each cross complainant prayed that the respective lien of each under his mortgage be protected by the court in the distribution of the proceeds arising out of the sale of the said mortgaged premises. After the filing of his cross-complaint Samuel Strasburger died, and appellant Nathan, as his executor, was substituted as a party in his place and stead. The receiver then filed his answer to each of these cross-complaints, whereby he sought to defeat the mortgages, and have them adjudged invalid by the court, upon the grounds that they were each executed by the said company as a preference to said complainants at a time when the company had become insolvent and had decided to make an assignment of its property for the benefit of its creditors, and that, therefore, by the laws of Ohio, under which the company had been incorporated, as construed by the supreme court of that state, it was forbidden, under the circumstances, to execute the mortgages in controversy; and the prayer was that each of these instruments be declared invalid, and that the cross complainants take nothing thereunder. The answer of the receiver to each of the cross-complaints was held sufficient upon demurrer, and the said complainants replied by the general denial; and, the cause being at issue between the said parties, it was submitted to the court for trial, and upon the evidence the court found for the receiver upon the issues joined upon the cross-complaints of Strasburger and Levi, to the effect that the mortgages in controversy were invalid, and did not constitute a lien upon the real estate therein described, nor a valid charge against the proceeds arising out of the sale of the mortgaged premises; and, over the separate motions of appellants for a new trial, wherein they each assigned, among others, as reasons therefor, that the finding of the court was contrary to law, and also contrary to the evidence, the court adjudged and decreed the mortgages to be invalid, and that they be set aside and held for naught.

From this judgment appellants have appealed to this court, and their separate assignments of error call in question the ruling of the court upon the demurrers to the answer of appellee to the cross-complaints, and also the overruling of their respective motions for a new trial. The evidence is in the record, and it discloses, among others, the facts heretofore stated. What might be denominated the charter of the corporation in question, or, rather, the governing laws of the state of Ohio relative to the creation of corporations, under which this company seems to have been incorporated and controlled, were introduced in evidence by the appellee. In addition to these statutes, the opinion of the supreme court of that state in the case of Rouse v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, decided June 18, 1889, and reported in 46 Ohio St. at page 493, 5 L. R. A. 378, was given in evidence upon the trial by the appellee. The holding of the supreme court of Ohio in that appeal was to the effect that a corporation organized for profit under the laws of Ohio, after it had become insolvent and had ceased to prosecute the object for which it was created, could not, by giving some of its creditors mortgages upon its corporate property to secure the payment of antecedent debts, create a valid preference in their favor over other creditors of the insolvent corporation, or over a general assignment thereafter made by such corporation for the benefit of its creditors. The contention of counsel for appellee, in the main, is that, as the G. Y. Roots Company was an Ohio corporation, it was governed by the laws of that state; that the laws of Ohio prohibited it from executing the mortgages to appellants, under the circumstances, as it did; and that these laws must be given force and effect by the courts of Indiana. Hence it is insisted that the right of appellants to enforce the mortgages in dispute was properly denied by the lower court. The question, as counsel for appellee propounded it, is, Can this foreign corporation prefer appellants, in the execution of these mortgages, over its other creditors, when its right to do so is denied by the laws of its domicile, and where, as in this case, the persons seeking to enforce their rights under the preference given are citizens of the same state under whose laws the corporation was created? Reduced to a single or simple proposition, the contention of counsel for appellee is that these mortgages were executed in violation of the charter of the company or governing laws of Ohio relative to corporations like the one in controversy, as such charter or laws have been construed or interpreted by the supreme court of that state in its decision in the case of Rouse v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, supra, and that the decision of the court in that case is as operative and controlling, under the circumstances, in Indiana as it is in Ohio, and that the rules of comity required the Dearborn circuit court to accept the principle or rule therein asserted as controlling upon it, and by reason thereof adjudge, under the facts, the mortgages in controversy to be invalid, and deny appellants' right to enforce them.

Counsel for the respective parties in this appeal have favored us with able and elaborate briefs, in which they have cited numerous authorities which, as it is insisted, support the proposition which each advances. It would, however, unnecessarily extend this opinion, were we to review or comment upon all of the cases referred to. Hence we content ourselves with such authorities as support the principles which in our opinion are controlling upon the questions involved in this cause.

It is a well-affirmed general rule that the laws of a sister state, which either give or deny the power to contract, have no extra-territorial force or effect where the particular contract involved relates to the conveyance or encumbrance of lands situated in another state or jurisdiction. Cochran v. Benton, 126 Ind. 58, and authorities there cited. Such conveyances or encumbrances are considered as being governed by the law of the situs of the realty, and all questions relating to the validity thereof are to be determined according to that law, and not according to the law of the place of the contract, or of the domicile of the contracting parties. 6 Thomp. Corp. § 772; Jones, Mortg. § 823; Whart. Conf. L. §§ 273, 274; Boehme v. Rall, 51 N. J. Eq. 541, and authorities there cited. Another rule is that it is the restrictions or prohibitions contained in the charter of a foreign corporation, or those of the governing laws of the state where it is organized, in relation thereto, which follow it into another state. It is such restrictions or prohibitions, as a general principle, and, these alone, which, under the rules of comity, are recognized and enforced in other jurisdictions, and not the general legislation or judicial decisions of the state in which such corporation is organized. The general laws, regulations, or decisions of the courts of a sister state are controlling only within its own limits, and such state has no power to give them force or effect in other jurisdictions. 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 967; Warren v. First Nat. Bank, 149 Ill. 9, 25 L. R. A. 746, and cases there cited; Boehme v. Rall, 51 N. J. Eq. 541; Borton v. Brines-Chase Co. 175 Pa. 209. We have examined the statutes of Ohio, introduced in evidence, which relate to corporations organized thereunder, and we discover nothing therein which can be said to forbid or prohibit an insolvent corporation of that state from mortgaging its corporate property or assets to secure a bona fide antecedent indebtedness of its own, and thereby prefer one or more of its creditors over others. If it appeared in this case that the mortgages in question were executed in violation of the express provisions of any of these statutes, or that the power or right of the company to execute the mortgages depended upon a construction placed upon a statute of that state by its highest court, quite a different question would be presented for our decision.

That an insolvent corporation, in like manner as an insolvent natural person, may, at common law, execute a mortgage upon its property to some of its creditors, and thereby create a preference, is a well-settled proposition. See 2 Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 779; Ang. & A. Corp. § 187, p. 168; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 802; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 358; Levering v. Bimel, 146 Ind. 545. Blackstone, in his Commentaries, asserts that it is necessarily and inseparably incident to every corporation aggregate that it has the power to sue or be sued, implead or be impleaded, grant or receive by its corporate name, and do all other acts as may a natural person. 1 Bl. Com. Cooley's ed. *475. In 2 Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 691, it is said: "Corporations, unless restricted by their charters or by general statutes, may make assignments for the benefit of creditors to the same extent that individuals may. In making the assignment, the corporation may make preferences for one or more creditors over others, or of one class of creditors over other classes. . . . A preference by the directors to themselves is generally held to be fraudulent." By § 5098, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881), § 3879, the legislature of this state has removed all doubt as to the right or power of a foreign corporation, organized for a like purpose as the one in this case, to acquire lands in this state and mortgage the same. This statute is an affirmative permission by the state to foreign corporations, organized for manufacturing and mining purposes, to purchase and hold real property in this state for the purpose of its business, and to convey or mortgage the same, as corporations of this state, organized for similar purposes, may do. It is true that this statute is not intended to confer any power or right upon a foreign corporation which is denied to it by its charter, or the governing laws of the place of its organization and domicile. As to the rights mentioned in the statute cited, it is simply permissive, and may be said to be but a recognition of the rules of comity existing between sister states. There is no question but what the indebtedness secured by these mortgages is a legitimate and bona fide one in all respects, and is such as the company was fully authorized, under the laws of Ohio, to contract or incur. Neither can it be said that a preference created thereby in favor of Strasburger and Levi was a part of the assignment made by the company on August 6, 1895. That assignment, as we have seen, was adjudged by the lower court to be invalid and of no effect so far as it attempted to assign or transfer property owned by the company situated in Dearborn county, Indiana; and the mortgaged premises apparently remained under the dominion of the company, after the execution of the mortgages, for a period of over six months, until the appointment of the receiver by the Dearborn circuit court on February 22, 1896.

The power of this corporation, under the circumstances, to make the mortgages, and thereby prefer these creditors over others, is not prohibited, as we have seen, by the statutes of its own state; neither is it denied by the rules of the common law or the laws of this state. The situs of the mortgaged premises being in Indiana, it is evident, under the circumstances, that the parties to the mortgages at the time of their execution must have contemplated their enforcement, if necessary, in the courts of this state. If these mortgages are to be adjudged invalid, and the right of appellants to enforce them denied, by the courts of this state, these results must follow by virtue of the rule announced and adopted by the supreme court of Ohio in Rouse v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 493, 5 L. R. A. 378. In that decision the court did not construe or interpret any statute of that state in relation to the execution of a mortgage by an insolvent corporation. The court therein expressly recognizes the fact that decisions of the higher courts of other jurisdictions are conflicting in respect to the question in dispute in that appeal; and the court expressly admits that it is one of first impression, so far as that 45 L. R. A.

court is concerned, and therefore, it is said, that it is at liberty to adopt the rule which in its judgment best coincides with justice and right. The rule adopted by the court in the case in question, and the one which controlled the question therein involved, is but an application of the equitable principle which arises out of what is denominated the "trust-fund doctrine." The foundation upon which this rule or doctrine, as recognized in the Rouse Case, and which now prevails in Ohio and other states, is said to rest, is that the assets or property of a corporation, when it becomes insolvent and has ceased to be a going concern, eo instanti become a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors, and, under the circumstances, its officers, being trustees for all of its creditors, cannot lawfully dispose of or encumber the property otherwise than for the equal benefit of all its creditors. This doctrine or rule does not prevail in this jurisdiction, and this court has declined to accept or enforce it. See Henderson v. Indiana Trust Co. 143 Ind. 561; First Nat. Bank v. Dovetail Body & Gear Co. 143 Ind. 534; Levering v. Bimel, 146 Ind. 545; First Nat. Bank v. Dovetail Body & Gear Co. 143 Ind. 550. In the case last cited, on page 553 of the opinion, 143 Ind. this court said: "The expression that the 'property of a corporation constitutes a 'trust fund' for its creditors,' only means that when the corporation is insolvent, and a court of equity has taken possession of its assets for administration, such assets must be appropriated to the payment of its debts before distribution to its stockholders, but, as between the corporation itself and its creditors, the corporation does not hold its property in trust or subject to a lien in favor of the creditors, in any other sense than does an individual debtor." In the appeal of Levering v. Bimel, on page 553 of the opinion, 146 Ind., we said: "As between the corporation and its creditors, it cannot, in reason, be said that the relation is anything more than that of debtor and creditor. The relation of trustee and cestui que trust does not exist so as to create a lien upon its assets in favor of the creditor, in any other sense than applies to an individual debtor."

While the decision of the Ohio court in the case in controversy is controlling in that jurisdiction upon like questions, when presented, it, as we have seen, can have no extrajudicial effect. It has merely a local application, and the courts of this state are not required to follow it, and by reason thereof declare invalid the mortgages in dispute, and deny appellant's right to enforce them. In addition to the authorities heretofore cited on this point, see Rhawn v. Pearce, 110 Ill. 350, 51 Am. Rep. 691. While we may and do yield great respect to the decisions of the supreme court of Ohio, still we are not bound to accept them as governing us in the administration and application of legal or equitable principles. It is true that the construction placed upon a statutory law by the courts of its own state will, by virtue of the rules of comity, be followed by the courts of a sister state in cases in which such statute may be involved; but as heretofore stated, the construction of a statute was not involved in the Rouse Case, but the question presented to the court in that appeal depended for its solution upon the view which the court might take in regard to the equitable rule or trust-fund doctrine. It is certainly manifest and well supported by authority that neither the principles of equity nor the common law, as they may be expounded by the supreme court of Ohio, are binding upon this court; but, in the administration of justice, we must adhere to and follow our own decisions or precedents in which such principles are exposed or expounded,—so far, at least, as we consider such decisions sound and correct. This rule is well affirmed by the courts of other states. St. Nicholas Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 128 N. Y. 26, 13 L. R. A. 241, and cases there cited.

The fact that the creditors in this cause are nonresidents of this state, and citizens of the state of Ohio, can exert no influence over the question as here presented. By the rule approved by this court in Catlin v. Wilcox Silver-Plate Co. 123 Ind. 477, 8 L. R. A. 62, it is asserted that when a citizen of another state is once properly in court, and accepted as a suitor, neither the law, nor the court administering the law, will admit any distinction between such a suitor and one who is a resident or a citizen of its own state. "Before the law and its tribunals there can be no preference of one over the other."

Tested by the rules prevailing in this state, as expounded and settled by our own decisions, relative to the validity of mortgages given in good faith by an insolvent corporation upon its corporate property to secure a bona fide antecedent indebtedness, we are constrained, under the facts, to uphold the validity of the mortgages in controversy. Under the evidence, the judgment of the lower court ought to have been in favor of appellants upon the issues tendered by the cross-complaints.

The judgment rendered by the Trial Court in favor of appellee upon the issues joined upon appellants' cross-complaints is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded to the lower court, with instructions to grant appellants a new trial, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY

v.

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The manufacturer who first uses a geographical name for his goods may put later comers to the trouble of taking such reasonable precautions as are commercially practicable to prevent their lawful names and advertisements from deceitfully diverting his custom.
2. The original manufacturer of Waltham watches may have an injunction against the use of the word "Waltham" or the words "Waltham, Mass." by another manufacturer of watches at that place, without any distinguishing statements, in such a way as to deceive the public, to the damage of the former.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench of a bill to enjoin defendant from making use of the word "Waltham" in connection with watches manufactured by it. Decree for plaintiff.

The trial justice, Knowlton, found that the plaintiff corporation for many years had been a manufacturer of watches at Waltham, and before defendant had begun to do business its watches of all grades had acquired a general reputation for excellence which made them much sought by purchasers in the market. It was then the only manufacturer of watches in that town, and it was accustomed to put upon the dial of each watch an abbreviation of its corporate name, with the word "Waltham" underneath. Its watches had come to be commonly known as Waltham watches.

Since 1885 defendant had been engaged in manufacturing watches in Waltham, and had been accustomed to put upon the dials of its watches the words and letters "U. S. Watch Co." with the word "Waltham" underneath. Dealers in watches are generally sufficiently familiar with the names and places of business of manufacturers to know that watches made by defendant are not manufactured by plaintiff. But persons about to purchase watches merely for personal use are generally ignorant in regard to such matters. The word "Waltham" was originally used by the plaintiff merely in a geographical sense, but by long use in connection with plaintiff's watches it came to have a secondary meaning as a designation of watches of a particular class. It was shown that defendant's watches had often been sold by dealers as Waltham watches. Sometimes dealers have expressly told purchasers that they were the watches commonly known as Waltham watches, whose excellence was well known. One of the purposes of defendant in using the word "Waltham" was to avail itself of the reputation of plaintiff's watches to increase the sale of its own. One or more of its managing officers sometimes advised the use of the word "Waltham" by its agents as an aid in making sales.

It did not appear that defendant's watches were of poor quality, and there is nothing to show that it was not trying to make them as good as the plaintiff's, but they had not acquired such a good reputation in the market as plaintiff's had. Defendant's sales had been materially increased, and plaintiff's sales had been materially diminished, by reason of the deception of ultimate purchasers, caused in part, and made easy and possible, by the use of the word "Waltham" on the plates and dials.

The trial justice was of opinion that the word had acquired a secondary meaning in connection with the plaintiff's watches of which defendant had no right to avail itself to the damage of plaintiff, and that there should be an injunction against the use by the defendant of the word "Waltham," or the words "Waltham, Mass.," upon plates of its watches without some accompanying statement which shall plainly distinguish its watches from those manufactured by plaintiff. The use of the word Waltham, in its geographical sense, on the dial, is not important to defendant, and its use should be enjoined. Watch movements were put in evidence to show that it would not be difficult to use in connection with the words "U. S. Watch Co., Waltham, Mass.," the words "No connection with the Am. Waltham Watch Co.," or "Not the original Waltham Watch Co.," or some similar explanatory statement.

Messrs. William A. Munroe, Frederick P. Fish, and Frank L. Crawford, for plaintiff:

The propriety of the issue of an injunction in cases of this nature is essentially not a question of law, but is one which must necessarily be determined by a comprehensive view of all the evidence.

The ground on which the leading cases go is that the word or words in question, which the second comer might otherwise have been free to use, have by long use acquired a secondary meaning whereby they have become the designation of the goods of a particular dealer, so that the public are confused and deceived if the words are allowed to be used by another.

R. A. 350.

Where the defendant is using the geographical word untruthfully, and therefore not in the exercise of any right, in such a case the plaintiff will receive protection.

Newman v. Alvoord, 49 Barb. 588; Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills Co. v. Eagle Co. 58 U. S. App. 490, 80 Fed. Rep. 608, 30 C. C. A. 386, 41 L. R. A. 162; La Republique Francaise v. Schultz, 57 Fed. Rep. 37; Southern White Lead Co. v. Cary, 25 Fed.

Rep. 125; Collinsplatt v. Finlayson, 98 Fed. Rep. 693; Siebert v. Findlater, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 801; Powell v. Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co. [1896] 2 Ch. 54; Gage-Downs Co. v. Featherbone Corset Co. 83 Fed. Rep. 213.

Where the defendant's use, though truthful, is not a necessary use, inasmuch as he can exercise his legal right to use the geographical or descriptive word in some other form or collocation than that adopted by the plaintiff, with equal advantage to himself so far as legitimate objects are concerned, in such a case the courts have sometimes interfered to regulate the exercise of the legal right, by requiring the defendant to refrain from using the collocation of words employed by the plaintiff.

Montgomery v. Thompson [1891] A. C. 217; Clark Thread Co. v. Armitage, 45 U. S. App. 62, 74 Fed. Rep. 936, 21 C. C. A. 178; Johann Hoff v. Tarrant & Co. 71 Fed. Rep. 163; Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R. 5 H. L. 508.

There are also two apparent exceptions to the generality of the rule that descriptive words (including words geographically descriptive) are for descriptive purposes; namely, that an exclusive right may be sustained when, as used, the word is purely arbitrary.

Siebert v. Findlater, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 801; Powell v. Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co. [1896] 2 Ch. 54; Hine v. Lart, 10 Jur. 106; Hirst v. Denham, L. R. 14 Eq. 542; Fleischmann v. Schuckmann, 62 How. Pr. 92; Taylor v. Carpenter, 3 Story, 458; Amos H. Van Horn v. Coogan, 52 N. J. Eq. 380.

The other apparent exception is that where the defendant's use is merely colorable—where he has for the purposes of fraud put himself in a position to be able to claim the legal right—the color of right will be disregarded by the court and the use treated as if unnecessary and in effect untruthful.

Wilson v. T. H. Garrett & Co. 47 U. S. App. 250, 78 Fed. Rep. 472, 24 C. C. A. 173; Pinet v. Maison Louis Pinet, 77 L. T. N. S. 613; Elgin Nat. Watch Co. v. Illinois Watch Case Co. 89 Fed. Rep. 487; Gebbie v. Stitt, 82 Hun, 93; Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R. 5 H. L. 508.

The proposition that if the defendant has deliberately, and with fraudulent intent, put himself in position to exercise the legal right, his color of right will be disregarded, is not universally accepted.

Glendon Iron Co. v. Uhler, 75 Pa. 467, 15 Am. Rep. 599.

While a word geographically or otherwise descriptive, or a personal name, cannot be appropriated as against others who can use it with equal truth, the second comer in the field will not be allowed to use the word with any additions, or devices, or suppression of facts, calculated to cause defendant's article to be mistaken for the plaintiff's article, nor to use it in one way to the damage of the plaintiff when legitimate purposes of the defendant can equally well be served by using it in some other way. In the absence of additions or suppressions, 43 L. R. A.

and when the defendant's use is a use necessary to give him legitimate benefit of his legal right, damage resulting from defendant's use is damnum absque injuria, without regard to the purpose of the defendant in exercising his right.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill brought to enjoin the defendant from advertising its watches as the "Waltham Watch" or "Waltham Watches," and from marking its watches in such a way that the word "Waltham" is conspicuous. The plaintiff was the first manufacturer of watches in Waltham, and had acquired a great reputation before the defendant began to do business. It was found at the hearing that the word "Waltham," which originally was used by the plaintiff in a merely geographical sense, now, by long use in connection with the plaintiff's watches, has come to have a secondary meaning as a designation of the watches which the public has become accustomed to associate with the name. This is recognized by the defendant so far that it agrees that the preliminary injunction, granted in 1890, against using the combined words "Waltham Watch" or "Waltham Watches" in advertising its watches, shall stand, and shall be embodied in the final decree.

The question raised at the hearing, and now before us, is whether the defendant shall be enjoined further against using the words "Waltham," or "Waltham, Mass.," upon plates of its watches, without some accompanying statement which shall distinguish clearly its watches from those made by the plaintiff. The judge who heard the case found that it is of considerable commercial importance to indicate where the defendant's business of manufacturing is carried on, as it is the custom of watch manufacturers so to mark their watches, but, nevertheless, found that such an injunction ought to issue. He also found that the use of the word "Waltham," in its geographical sense, upon the dial, is not important, and should be enjoined.

The defendant's position is that, whatever its intent and whatever the effect in diverting a part of the plaintiff's business, it has a right to put its name and address upon its watches; that to require it to add words which will distinguish its watches from the plaintiff's in the mind of the general public is to require it to discredit them in advance; and that if the plaintiff, by its method of advertisement, has associated the fame of its merits with the city where it makes its wares, instead of with its own name, that is the plaintiff's folly, and cannot give it a monopoly of a geographical name, or entitle it to increase the defendant's burden in advertising the place of its works.

In cases of this sort, as in so many others, what ultimately is to be worked out is a point or line between conflicting claims, each of which has meritorious grounds, and would be extended further were it not for the other. Boston Ferrule Co. v. Hills, 159 Mass. 147, 149, 150, 20 L. R. A. 844. It is desirable that the plaintiff should not lose custom by reason of the public mistaking another manufacturer for it. It is desirable that the defendant should be free to manufacture watches at Waltham, and to tell the world that it does so. The two desiderata cannot both be had to their full extent, and we have to fix the boundaries as best we can. On the one hand, the defendant must be allowed to accomplish its desideratum in some way, whatever the loss to the plaintiff. On the other, we think, the cases show that the defendant fairly may be required to avoid deceiving the public to the plaintiff's harm, so far as is practicable in a commercial sense. It is true that a man cannot appropriate a geographical name; but neither can he a color, or any part of the English language, or even a proper name, to the exclusion of others whose names are like his. Yet a color in connection with a sufficiently complex combination of other things may be recognized as saying so circumstantially that the defendant's goods are the plaintiff's as to pass the injunction line. New England Aul & Needle Co. v. Marlborough Aul & Needle 43 L. R. A.

Co. 168 Mass. 154, 156. So, although the plaintiff has no copyright on the dictionary, or any part of it, he can exclude a defendant from a part of the free field of the English language, even from the mere use of generic words, unqualified and unexplained, when they would mislead the plaintiff's customers to another shop. Reddaway v. Banham [1896] A. C. 199. So, the name of a person may become so associated with his goods that one of the same name coming into the business later will not be allowed to use even his own name without distinguishing his wares. Brinsmead v. Brinsmead, 13 The Times L. R. 3; Reddaway v. Banham [1896] A. C. 199, 210. See Singer Mfg. Co. v. June Mfg. Co. 163 U. S. 169, 204, 41 L. ed. 118, 131; Allegritti Chocolate Cream Co. v. Keller, 85 Fed. Rep. 643. And so, we doubt not, may a geographical name acquire a similar association with a similar effect. Montgomery v. Thompson [1891] A. C. 217.

Whatever might have been the doubts some years ago, we think that now it is pretty well settled that the plaintiff, merely on the strength of having been first in the field, may put later comers to the trouble of taking such reasonable precautions as are commercially practicable to prevent their lawful names and advertisements from deceitfully diverting the plaintiff's custom.

We cannot go behind the finding that such a deceitful diversion is the effect, and intended effect, of the marks in question. We cannot go behind the finding that it is practicable to distinguish the defendant's watches from those of the plaintiff, and that it ought to be done. The elements of the precise issue before us are the importance of indicating the place of manufacture and the discrediting effect of distinguishing words on the one side, and the importance of preventing the inferences which the public will draw from the defendant's plates as they now are, on the other. It is not possible to weigh them against each other by abstractions or general propositions. The question is specific and concrete. The judge who heard the evidence has answered it, and we cannot say that he was wrong.

Decree for plaintiff.

The decree enjoined defendant generally from using the words "Waltham watch" or "Waltham watches" or using the word "Waltham" otherwise than geographically and "from using the word Waltham with or without other words on the dial of its watches; from making, selling, or disposing of watches or parts of watches having plates inscribed with the word Waltham unless accompanied by the word "Mass." and unless there is also prominently collocated with the word "Waltham" the words "A new watch company at Waltham Est'd 1885," and unless its corporate name, whether in full or abbreviated, is printed on such plates in letters easily legible; from using the word "Waltham" in any such way as to induce the belief that its watches are made by plaintiff; and from doing anything to avail itself of the reputation of the plaintiff's watches to increase the sale of its own.

v.

(.....Mass.....)

An executor will not be personally bound by his indorsement of commercial paper by the words "Estate of" his testator followed by his own name "Executor."

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to a ruling of the Superior Court for Worcester County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to hold defendant liable upon an indorsement on certain promissory notes. Sustained.

These actions were brought to hold the Wing estate liable for indorsements which had been made by Wing as executor of the estate of Jonathan D. Wheeler, deceased. The notes had originally been indorsed by Wheeler and were renewed by the indorsement of H. F. Wing, and during the life of the notes the president of the banks told Wing that the indorsements bound him personally and not the Wheeler estate. The president of the banks testified that when the Wing indorsement was first made the banks questioned his right to indorse the notes in that way and from that time constantly took the position toward him of absence of authority on his part to make the indorsement so as to bind the estate.

Mr. Wing at the same time claimed that the indorsements were proper. Defendant requested the court to instruct that there was no indorsement on the note which bound the defendant's testator personally, but the court refused so to rule and found for plaintiff in each case, to which ruling the defendant excepted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank P. Goulding and William C. Mellis for plaintiff.

Messrs. John B. Scott and T. H. Gage, Jr., for defendant:

The indorsement in question does not purport to bind Henry F. Wing personally.

The renewal notes were not payment, but an extension of the old liability of Jona. D. Wheeler.

Tucker v. Drake, 11 Allen, 145; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1266 et seq.

Consequently the indorsements were not a new promise to pay, and do not impose any new liability upon the estate, but were promises to pay a debt created by Wheeler, and the defendant's intestate was liable de bonis testatoris.

NOTE.—As to the effect of the qualifying word "executor" in a contract, see also note to Rich v. Sowles (Vt.) 15 L. R. A. 850.

If the estate of Jonathan D. Wheeler was not bound by the form of indorsement, it was not in form to bind Henry F. Wing personally, and no one was bound by it.

The indorsement is not in form to reject the word "executor" as surplusage or descriptio personæ.

Dan. Neg. Inst. § 202; Rittenhouse v. Ammerman, 64 Mo. 197, 27 Am. Rep. 215; Taylor v. Shelton, 30 Conn. 122.

If the executor was bound by the indorsement, it was only on a promise to pay out of the estate of Wheeler, and his liability is de bonis testatoris, as the form and manifest intention of the indorsement was to limit the payment to that estate.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 203; Childs v. Monins, 2 Brod. & R. 460.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are two actions of contract against the administrator of the estate of Henry F. Wing, seeking to hold him upon two indorsements made by Henry F. Wing, as executor of the will of Jonathan D. Wheeler. The indorsements were in the following form:

Estate of Jona. D. Wheeler,
Henry F. Wing, Executor.

A majority of the court are of opinion that these words mean, "Estate of Wheeler, by Wing," and therefore that, at least, they failed to bind Wing by contract. It is quite true that the law does not know the estate of a dead man as a contractor, and that, unless the fact that these indorsements were the renewal of indorsements by Wheeler in his lifetime makes a difference, they did not bind the estate. But that merely shows that the indorsements were made by Wing under a mistake of law, as the testimony also proves to have been a fact. But the presence of Wing's name upon the paper, and his failure to bind his supposed principal, are not enough to make the contract his own. Jefts v. York, 4 Cush. 371, 50 Am. Dec. 791, 10 Cush. 392, 395, 396; Abbey v. Chase, 6 Cush. 54, 56, 57; Taylor v. Shelton, 30 Conn. 122. If a man does not purport to be a party to negotiable paper, he is not a party to it. See, further, 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. §§ 306-308; Bartlett v. Tucker, 104 Mass. 336, 6 Am. Rep. 240. It is true that it is suggested by Mr. Daniel that, in such cases, an ambiguous expression may be interpreted to bind the agent; but neither that suggestion, nor a presumption that the agent knew the law, can pervert words from their meaning, if the meaning is plain. The so-called "presumption" is a requirement, not a presumption of fact, and has no bearing or weight upon the construction of instruments.

We are of opinion that the court should have ruled that the defendant was not liable.

v.

LYNN & BOSTON RAILROAD.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A passenger on whom a drunken man is thrown by being jostled while the conductor is removing another drunken man from the car rightfully and without negligence has no right of action therefor against the carrier.
2. The enhancement, because of fright, of the damages sustained by a passenger on whom a drunken man is thrown in a car while another drunken man is being removed from the car must be limited to the fright caused by the personal contact with the former, and cannot extend to the fright resulting from the general disturbance.
3. A street-car conductor's knowledge of the peculiar sensitiveness of a lady passenger does not increase the carrier's obligation toward her, although in case of a wrong toward her the carrier will be liable for the actual consequences, even if the effect would have been less upon a normal person.

(January 16, 1899.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. K. Cobb for defendant.

Messrs. S. L. Whipple and W. R. Sears for plaintiff.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for personal injuries, which already has been before the court. 168 Mass. 285, 38 L. R. A. 512. At the second trial the evidence was that the defendant's conductor, in removing a drunken man from a car, jostled another drunken man, who was standing in front of the plaintiff, and threw him upon her. The fall upon her seems to have been a trifling matter, taken by itself, but the fright caused by that and the rest of the occurrences in the car resulted in physical injury. The case comes up again upon exceptions.

The judge was asked to direct a verdict for the defendant. We find some difficulty in seeing upon what ground the jury were warranted in finding for the plaintiff. So far as appears, the conductor was acting rightly in putting the drunken man off the car. As against the plaintiff, he was doing one of the things which she had to contemplate as liable to happen, when she got into the car. We all know that, if people are standing in the passageway of a street car, you cannot remove a man forcibly through the passageway without more or less contact. If the fall upon the plaintiff was the necessary consequence of a lawful and reasonable act, then it was one of the risks which she assumed when she took her passage.

It is a question which deserves more discussion than it has received, whether a man is answerable for an injury inflicted upon an innocent stranger knowingly, or with sufficient notice of the danger, if the injury is an unavoidable incident of lawful self-protection. It might be said, and it has been held, when it is a question of paying damages, that a man cannot shift his misfortunes to his neighbor's shoulders. Gilbert v. Stone, Allyn, 35, Style, 72; Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892, 896; Cooley, Torts, p. 115. See McLeod v. Jones, 105 Mass. 403, 405, 7 Am. Rep. 539; Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 547, 10 L. R. A. 116; Pierce v. Cunard S. S. Co. 153 Mass. 87, 90; Whalley v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 131. And compare the rule as to duress in contracts and conveyances. Fairbanks v. Snow, 145 Mass. 153, 155. On the other hand, the contrary has been intimated in a case of shooting in self-defense, the injury to the third person being treated on the footing of accident. Morris v. Platt, 32 Conn. 75, 84. See Bacon Max. Reg. 5, 6; Addison, Torts, 6th ed. 380, 383. And the right to pull down a house when the destruction is necessary to stop a fire, as it usually is stated, looks the same way. See Taylor v. Plymouth, 8 Met. 462, 465; American Print Works v. Lawrence, 23 N. J. L. 590, 613, 57 Am. Dec. 420. The alleged immunity for the necessary destruction of a building suggests that perhaps the question cannot be answered in general terms, and that one possible distinction may be found where the parties have a common interest, even though the act done in furtherance of it may cause more harm than good to the plaintiff. Perhaps it would be unsafe to find any countenance to such a distinction in decisions as to the rights of landowners or officials in diking against water when it appears as a common enemy. King v. Pagham Sewer Comrs. 8 Barn. & C. 355; Nield v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 10 Exch. 4. Compare Whalley v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 131. But when we go a step further, and take a case like the present, where all parties concerned are in a conveyance, and to maintain order and keep the car clear of obnoxious persons is the defendant's right, and its duty to the plaintiff and the other passengers, no passenger can complain of any consequence which the performance of that duty necessarily entails. We assume for present purposes that carriers of passengers owe the same degree of care in respect of such matters as they owe in respect of the construction and management of their vehicles, but, if that care is shown, probably the injury must be regarded as an inevitable accident. As to whether there was any negligence in the manner of expelling the drunken man, or otherwise, we will go no further than to say that it has not been pointed out to us. We need not decide the question, as there must be a new trial for another reason.

A ruling was asked to the effect that the plaintiff could recover only for the pain and fright caused by the contact with her person, and not for such mental disturbance and injury as was caused by other acts of the conductor, and the general disturbance in the car. This was refused, and the jury were instructed that if there was a physical injury, and accompanied by it there was fright which operated to her injury in body or mind, she could recover for the damage caused by the fright, and the jury were told that they might take all that happened as one whole. The effect of the refusal and the instructions appears to us to have been that, when once a battery of the plaintiff was proved, the defendant became, or might be found, liable for all the consequences of the disturbance in the car, and of the plaintiff's fright, however caused. We do not so understand the law. By something of an anomaly, consequences of the defendant's conduct which would not of themselves constitute a cause of action may at times enhance the damages, if the conduct has some other consequence for which an action lies. But this further liability is not for all consequences of the defendant's conduct, but for consequences of the defendant's wrong to the plaintiff. The wrong to the plaintiff, if any, began with the battery; and it is for the consequences of the battery only that the defendant is liable, not for all the consequences of the drunken man's presence in the car, or of the defendant's attempt to remove him. We are perfectly aware of the difficulty of discriminating. But it seems quite possible in this case that the plaintiff's trouble was due, in substance, to the disturbance as a whole, although it may be that the jury would be warranted in finding that the impact upon her person gave the detonating spark, without which she would not have collapsed. It is unnecessary to express an opinion whether the evidence in this case warranted the latter finding.

We may add a word with reference to a suggestion made on behalf of the plaintiff and having some bearing upon the eighth instruction asked, and the instructions given. It is argued that, because the conductor had known the plaintiff for several years, the defendant's obligations to her were increased, if the jury believed that she was a particularly sensitive person, and that the conductor must have known it. We regard such an argument, even to the jury, as wholly inadmissible. Ordinary street cars must be run with reference to ordinary susceptibilities, and the liability of their proprietors cannot be increased simply by a passenger's notifying the conductor that he has unstable nerves. In this case it was left to the jury to say whether there was anything that called for special attention to the plaintiff, beyond what was due to other women. Nothing is pointed out to us as a basis for such increased obligation, except the conductor's acquaintance with the plaintiff, and that laid no foundation for it. We should add, however, to avoid being misunderstood, and with reference to the plaintiff's tenth request, that, if the defendant's servant did commit an unjustifiable battery on the plaintiff's person, the defendant must answer for the actual consequences of that wrong to her as she was, and cannot cut down her damages by showing that the effect would have been less upon a normal person. Braithwaite v. Hall, 168 Mass. 38, 40. The measure of the defendant's duty in determining whether a wrong has been committed is one thing; the measure of liability when a wrong has been committed is another.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff while a passenger upon a train of the defendant. The case, as stated by the plaintiff's witnesses, was as follows: A lamp opposite where the plaintiff was sitting blazed up. A bystander, and then the conductor, tried to fan out the flame with their hats, but did not succeed, and the plaintiff changed her seat to the other end of the car, next to the baggage car. Then a brakeman tried to smother the flame with oily waste, which caught fire, and blazed, part of it dropping on the floor. The flames came out underneath the lamp. The brakeman got down, and rushed for the rear end of the car, and it looked as if the car was on fire. Thereupon the plaintiff rose to go into the baggage car, presumably in some haste and fright, and struck her arm, hurting her ulnar nerve so badly that she fainted and fell.

An expert on lamps, who was a passenger, testified that the lamp needed more care than ordinary lamps; that the means used to put out the fire were dangerous; and that, with proper skill, the trouble could have been avoided. The judge refused to take the case from the jury, and the defendant excepted.

The judge who tried the case was right. We cannot say, as matter of law, how frightened the plaintiff was or ought to have been, or how great the peril of fire may have seemed. There is no question before us of the degree of firmness which the plaintiff was bound to exhibit, or, more accurately, of the defendant's immunity from consequences due to unstable nerves. Spade v. Lynn & B. R. (Mass.) (Suffolk, Jan. 16, 1899) ante, 832. If the peril seemed imminent, more hasty and violent action was to be expected than would be natural at quieter moments; and such conduct is to be judged with reference to the stress of appearances at the time, and not by the cool estimate of the actual danger formed by outsiders after the event. See Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 506, 511, 512, 30 Am. Rep. 692; Hawks v. Locke, 139 Mass. 205, 209; Pomeroy v. Westfield, 154 Mass. 462, 465. We cannot say that an impulsive, and somewhat unguarded, rise from her seat was not a natural and reasonable consequence of the situation as it appeared to the plaintiff. If it was, and if her fear was reasonable,—which, as we have said, we cannot pronounce it not to have been, whatever we may conjecture that we should have thought had we been the jury,—then the plaintiff's conduct is recognized by the law as a consequence of the defendant's mismanagement, for which it is responsible. Ingalls v. Bills, 9 Met. 1, 43 Am. Dec. 346; Sears v. Dennis, 105 Mass. 310, 313; Cody v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 151 Mass. 462, 468, 469, 7 L. R. A. 843.

The case of Spade v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 168 Mass. 285, 38 L. R. A. 512, does not establish a principle contrary to that of the foregoing decisions. It admits that principle, and merely sets a limit to its logical extent, upon practical considerations.

BOARD OF ALDERMEN of Boston et al.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The benefit to abutting property from the watering of a street in front of it may be such an improvement to the property that it can be made the subject of an assessment upon it.
2. Assessments for the sprinkling of streets within a certain territory may be lawfully made upon abutting property, although the sprinkling of other parts of the city is done at the public expense.
3. The frontage rule of assessments for watering streets may be upheld when it does not appear that as applied to the property assessed it is not an approximately accurate method of determining benefits.
4. Street-sprinkling assessments made by a superintendent of streets by direction of the board of aldermen, and reported to them, may be regarded as made by the aldermen themselves, when they have made an appropriation based on the report.

PETITION for a writ of certiorari to quash certain alleged erroneous assessments for street sprinkling. Dismissed.

In 1897 the legislature passed an act relative to the watering of streets in cities. This statute gave authority to assess the expense of watering in whole or in part upon abutting owners. The city council of Boston by order approved April 18, 1898, determined that all streets or portions of streets lying within the central portion of the city should be watered in whole at the expense of the abutters, and that all other streets and portions of streets should be watered in whole at the expense of the city. The board of aldermen authorized the superintendent of streets to determine the amount of the assessment for street watering to be laid upon the estates abutting upon the streets within the part of the city designated to be watered by assessment. Seventy-five thousand dollars was appropriated for watering those streets to be raised by assessments upon abutting property. The superintendent of streets made a list of the streets or portions of streets which the city had determined should be watered, specifying the number of linear feet of each estate upon the street. The amount of assessment was fixed for 5 cents per front foot. The computation showed that the amount necessary to be raised was $138,511, and the aldermen appropriated the difference between the amount already appropriated and that sum for the purpose required, and the list of estates subject to assessment was sent to the assessors.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Choate, Jr., for petitioner:

This assessment is not a valid exercise of the taxing power.

Street watering is not a matter which can legally be made the subject of a local assessment.

The justification for a local assessment is an added value conferred upon the land benefited by any public improvement. By this benefit is meant a peculiar special benefit which accrues to those whose land is directly affected, and peculiarly enhanced in value by the improvement.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for a writ of certiorari to quash alleged illegal assessments laid to meet the cost of watering streets in the city of Boston, under Stat. 1897, chap. 419. The first and most important question in the case is whether this statute is constitutional. The right of the legislature to raise money by taxation is founded upon article 4, § 1, chap. 1, of the Constitution of the commonwealth. Under this article there is authority "to impose and levy reasonable duties and excises upon any produce, goods, wares, merchandise, and commodities," etc. This authority we need not consider in the present case. Secondly, there is authority "to impose and levy proportional and reasonable assessments, rates, and taxes upon all the inhabitants of, and persons resident and estates lying within the said commonwealth." The watering of streets in thickly settled portions of cities is such a public benefit that it legitimately may be provided for at the public expense. So far as it promotes the comfort, convenience, and prosperity of the people generally as distinguished from landowners, it should be provided for by general taxation, which involves the assessment of proportional and reasonable taxes upon all persons and property within the city. The statute purports to authorize every city, not only to "appropriate money for watering the public ways, or portions thereof, within its limits, at the expense, in whole or in part, of the city," but also to "determine that certain other public ways or portions thereof shall be watered at the expense in whole or in part of the abutters thereon." Stat. 1897, chap. 419, § 1. This last provision calls for another kind of taxation, which is local and special. Such taxation, under the Constitution, can only exist when there is a special or peculiar benefit to certain real estate, different from that which is received by the inhabitants generally. The owners of the land upon which such an assessment is made must pay the same share of the general taxes in proportion to the value of their property that other persons pay. As the Constitution requires that taxes shall be proportional and reasonable, this additional special tax can be justified only when there is a special benefit to property from the expenditure on account of which the assessment is made. Wright v. Boston, 9 Cush. 233, 234; Proprietors of Mt. Auburn Cemetery v. Cambridge, 150 Mass. 12-14, 4 L. R. A. 836; Dorgan v. Boston, 12 Allen, 233-237; *Boston v. Boston & A. R. Rep. 289; Sharpe v. Speir, 4 Hill, 82; Hammett v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 146-157, 3 Am. Rep. 615; Tidewater Co. v.

Coster, 18 N. J. Eq. 527, 90 Am. Dec. 634; Norfolk v. Chamberlain, 89 Va. 196-213; Nichols v. Bridgeport, 23 Conn. 189, 60 Am. Dec. 636; Thomas v. Gain, 35 Mich. 162, 24 Am. Rep. 635; Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 254; Sheehan v. Good Samaritan Hospital, 50 Mo. 155, 11 Am. Rep. 412.

In the last analysis, the assessment is not laid as a part of the burden of public expenditure put upon the land; for the burdens which are strictly public are to be shared proportionally by all the people, according to the value of their taxable property. It is rather in the nature of a diminution of that which at first is a public burden, by subtracting from it the amount of the special enhancement of value of private property from the expenditure of public money in part for its benefit. It is taxation in the sense that it is a distribution of that which is originally a public burden, growing out of an expenditure primarily for a public purpose.

It is a grave question whether the benefit that comes to abutting property from the watering of the street in front of it is such an improvement to the property that it can be made the subject of an assessment upon it. There must be a real substantial enhancement of value growing out of a public work to warrant an assessment of special taxes upon particular estates on account of it. The watering of streets produces only transitory effects, and makes no permanent change in the condition of the property. It greatly promotes the health and comfort of the people generally, who use the streets from time to time, but its greatest benefit is to the abutting estates as places for residence or the transaction of business. Indeed, so much more important to the occupants than to the general public have been the benefits from watering streets that until lately the expense of the work in this commonwealth has usually been borne by the abutters, who have procured the watering to be done by private contractors. If a special benefit, accruing from day to day, which very materially increases the rental value of real estate by reason of the proximity of the property to the place where the beneficial work is done, can be treated as an improvement within the reason of the rule which permits special assessments, then such assessments may be made to pay the expense of watering streets. With some hesitation, we hold that there is an improvement of private property when this work is done by a city, which may warrant an assessment upon the abutters. It was so held in State, Stateler, v. Reis, 38 Minn. 371, and in Reinkin v. Fushring, 130 Ind. 382, 15 L. R. A. 624, although the cases generally which uphold such assessments relate to improvements of a permanent character. Many improvements from which real estate receives an incidental advantage are held to justify only general taxation. Hammett v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 146, 3 Am. Rep. 615; Washington Avenue, 69 Pa. 352, 8 Am. Rep. 255; Erle v. Russell, 148 Pa. 384-386; Dyer v. Farmington, 70 Me. 527; State, McClosky, v. Chamberlin, 37 N. J. L. 388; Diets v. Neenah, 91 Wis. 422-427, and 91 Wis. 430. Treating the watering of a street in a city as a work which may cause a direct, special, and peculiar benefit to abutting estates, and thus enhance their value so long as it continues, we come to the question whether the mode of assessment directed by this statute is within the constitutional power of the legislature. Section 2 of the statute is as follows: "If a city shall determine that the streets or certain streets or portions of streets within its limits shall be watered in whole or in part at the expense of the abutters, the expense of the watering of such streets or portions of streets for that municipal year, and the proportion of such expense to be borne by abutters, and the rate to be assessed upon each linear foot of frontage of estate upon such streets or portions thereof, shall be estimated and determined by the board of aldermen, and the expense so determined of such watering to be borne by the abutters, shall be assessed in the manner hereinafter provided upon the estates abutting on such streets or portions of streets in proportion to the number of linear feet of each estate upon the street or portion thereof so watered." Section 3 provides for a determination of the amount of the assessments, either by the board of aldermen, or by that one of several other specified boards of public officers which the aldermen may designate. Section 4 declares that each assessment shall be a lien upon the estate on which it is laid, and directs the collection of assessments in like manner as other taxes are collected, and provides for abatements. It is now established by the highest judicial authority that such assessments cannot be so laid upon any estate as to be in substantial excess of the benefit received. The case of Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. —, contains an elaborate discussion of the subject, with a citation of authorities from many of the states, and holds that a local assessment for an amount in substantial excess of the benefit received is in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, inasmuch as it would deprive one of his property without compensation, and so without due process of law. The authority of this case is controlling in all state courts, and, if it were not, it is in accordance with sound principles, and with the great weight of authority in other courts. The principles which have often been stated by this court lead to the same result. Boston v. Boston & A. R. Co. 170 Mass. 95-101, and cases cited. The case of Kingman, Petitioner, 153 Mass. 566, 12 L. R. A. 417, dealt with a legislative distribution of public burdens among different political subdivisions of the commonwealth, and the language in it must be construed in reference to the facts to which it relates. The right to apportion public burdens among cities, towns, and counties, as it deems reasonable in reference to benefits and to other considerations which are not capable of exact estimation in money, is within the power of the legislature, under the first part of article 4, § 1, chap. 1, of the Constitution, and is not the same as the right to impose and levy taxes upon individuals. It is of the same nature as the right to create, change, or abolish cities, towns, or other political subdivisions of the commonwealth.

While these assessments must be founded upon benefits, the courts have generally recognized the difficulty, and in many cases the impracticability, of attempting to estimate benefits to estates one by one without some rule or principle of general application which will make the assessments reasonable and proportional, according to the benefits. Accordingly, the determination of such a rule or principle by the legislature itself, or by the tribunal appointed by the legislature to make the assessments, has commonly been upheld by the courts. If, however, its effect plainly is to make an assessment upon any estate substantially in excess of the benefit received, it is set aside. Weed v. Boston, 172 Mass. 28, 42 L. R. A. 642; Village of Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed.

— Assessments of special taxes by an estimate of the particular benefits to each lot, by measurement of the amount of frontage upon a street or sewer, by the measurement of the area of the lots, and by a valuation of the property, have all been sustained. Springfield v. Gay, 12 Allen, 612; Dorgan v. Boston, 12 Allen, 223; Downer v. Boston, 7 Cush. 277; Wright v. Boston, 9 Cush. 233; Workman v. Worcester, 118 Mass. 168; Keith v. Boston, 120 Mass. 108; Snow v. Fitchburg, 136 Mass. 183; Howe v. Cambridge, 114 Mass. 385; Chapin v. Worcester, 124 Mass. 464; Camden v. Johnson, 104 Mass. 491; Leominster v. Conant, 139 Mass. 384. But, as we have already intimated, the only ground on which they can properly rest is that they are methods reasonably determined upon, by the tribunals charged with the duty of determining, in reference to the ascertainment of the benefits actually received by the different estates on which assessments are to be laid. It may be that, in the light of recent decisions, some of these cases would have been decided differently; but, in general, they rest on sound principles, on the grounds already stated. Most of our cases and our statutes assume, under the Constitution, that these assessments, like other taxes, are to be reasonable, and, in a general sense, proportional.

Under the present statute, it is implied that the board of aldermen and the tribunal making assessments will proceed upon correct principles, and assess according to the benefits received, unless the requirement that the assessments are to be "in proportion to the number of linear feet of each estate upon the street or portion thereof so watered" is objectionable, as founded on a wrong principle. Such requirements in regard to ordinary estates fronting upon streets and sewers have often been upheld. On the other hand, in reference to estates differently situated, they sometimes would call for assessments far beyond any benefit received, and would therefore be unconstitutional and void. Weed v. Boston, 172 Mass. 28, 42 L. R. A. 642. No facts appear in the present case to show that this rule is not proper in its application to the petitioner's estates, as a method of determining benefits with such approximation to accuracy as can reasonably be required. There may be unoccupied lands in the city which are so situated that they could receive no substantial benefit, either actually or potentially, from the watering of adjacent streets, so long as they remain in their present condition. Assessments made upon such lands might be void; but, as the case does not disclose such, we have no occasion to consider them. We see no reason why the legislature may not authorize a city to water some of its streets at the public expense, and to assess benefits for the watering of others upon abutters, as it deems best. As a result, some landowners get the benefit of watering streets adjacent to their estate without paying for the special benefit. But perfect equality in the distribution of public burdens is not attainable. We are therefore of opinion that, in its application to the facts of the present case, the statute is constitutional.

If the aldermen might cause some of the streets to be watered at the expense of the city, and others to be watered at the expense of the abutters, it is not shown that their determination in regard to it was improper.

Although the proceedings were in some respects informal, we see no fatal error in them. We are inclined to agree with the petitioner's counsel in his contention that the determination of the expense of watering streets to be watered in whole or in part at the expense of the abutters, and the proportion of such expense to be borne by the abutters, and the rate to be assessed upon each linear foot of frontage of estates upon which such streets or portions thereof abut, is to be by the board of aldermen, and cannot be delegated to any other board or tribunal. But we are also of opinion that the action of the superintendent of streets in making those assessments and reporting them to the board of aldermen, with the communication of the mayor and the subsequent order asking an appropriation, taken in connection with the previous orders, are equivalent to an original determination of these matters by the aldermen themselves. The petitioner shows no such error as to entitle him to a writ of certiorari.

FIRE ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA.

(.....Mich.....)

A policy of insurance on a steam fire engine, hose pipe, and hose cart, while located and contained in the fire-engine house, "and not elsewhere," does not cover such property while being used in attempting to extinguish a fire several hundred feet from that building.

(March 6, 1899.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Baraga County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Philip R. McKernan and Frank E. Robson, for plaintiff in error:

The language of the policy being that of the insurer, and intended for his benefit, any reasonable doubt as to its meaning must be resolved in favor of the insured.

The language of the policy must be construed with reference to the character of and circumstances surrounding the property covered by it and the purposes for which it is ordinarily kept and used.

The purpose and intent of the contract being indemnity to the insured, the contract should be given effect, if possible, rather than made void.

NOTE.—As to location of movable property as affecting fire insurance thereon, see note to Benton v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Mich.) 26 L. R. A. 237; also Lakings v. Phenix Ins. Co. 43 L. R. A.

May, Ins. §§ 174, 175, 177; Joyce, Ins. §§ 210, 212, 220, 221; De Graff v. Queen Ins. Co. 38 Minn. 501; Jackson v. British America Assur. Co. 106 Mich. 47, 30 L. R. A. 636.

The words "while located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere," are not to be construed as words limiting or prohibiting the ordinary uses of the fire engine, etc., and are not a warranty, the terms of which would be broken by a temporary removal for the purpose of such uses.

The words "contained in" were in use before the adoption of the standard policy, and had a well-settled meaning. If applied to property, the natural use of which required it to be kept in one place, the insurance was lost if the property was removed to some other place.

English v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 55 Mich. 273, 54 Am. Rep. 377; May, Ins. §§ 401 B, 401 C; Joyce, Ins. § 1742.

If, however, the property is of a sort that the natural uses of it require a temporary removal from the place designated in the policy, and while so temporarily absent the property is destroyed, it is still covered by the policy.

Mr. A. R. Gray for defendant in error.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On April 9, 1896, the defendant issued its policy of insurance to the plaintiff for the term of one year from April 19, 1896. The policy provides that the association does "insure village of L'Anse . . . against all direct loss or damages by fire, except as hereinafter provided, to an amount not exceeding $1,500, to the following described property, while located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere, to wit: $400 on the two-story frame, shingled roof, fire engine house, situate detached 70 feet, in the village of L'Anse, Baraga county, Michigan; $700 on steam fire engine and heater attached; $200 on hose and hose pipe; $300 on hose cart, tools, and machinery not enumerated,—all contained in above-described building. $1,500 other concurrent insurance noted." Then follows the usual Michigan form of standard policy. On May 9, 1896, the said steam fire engine hose, hose pipe, and hose cart, as covered by the policy, were burned and destroyed by fire. None of the above property was in the building at the time it was burned, but was being used in an attempt to extinguish a fire some 200 to 800 feet from the building. The defendant refused to pay the damages claimed by the plaintiff for the loss of the property, on the ground that, under the policy, it was insured only while contained in the building mentioned and described in the policy, and not elsewhere. The action brought to recover on the policy was tried before the court 43 L. R. A. without a jury, and the court found in favor of defendant's contention, and thereupon entered judgment in its favor. Plaintiff brings error.

It is admitted by counsel for plaintiff that the case involves but the one question: What is the proper construction of the words in the policy, "while located and contained as described herein and not elsewhere"? It is argued by counsel that the usual purpose and use by the plaintiff of a fire engine, hose, hose cart, and other appliances described in the policy would be to extinguish fires in the village, and that, in order to be so used, it would be, as occasion might require, temporarily out of the engine house, which would be its place of deposit when not in use; that such use must have been contemplated by both parties to the contract; and that such use must be presumed to have been taken into consideration by the defendant in fixing the rate of premium. It is said by counsel that the words "contained in," etc., and like expressions, were in use before the adoption of the standard form of policy, and had a well-settled meaning, and, if applied to property the natural use of which required it to be kept in one place, the insurance was lost if the property was removed to some other place, but if, however, the property was of a sort that the natural use of it required a temporary removal from the place designated in the policy, and while so temporarily absent was destroyed, it was covered by the policy; that the words, "contained in," etc., were of further description, and indicated the place of deposit, when the property was not necessarily absent. It is therefore contended that, in framing the standard policy, the intention was to express and adopt this construction. On the other hand, counsel for the defendant claims that, even under the old forms of policy, the insurance did not continue while the property was removed from its place of deposit, where the limitations were as contained in this policy, to wit, "while located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere." We think the cases cited by counsel for plaintiff clearly distinguishable from the policy in suit. Here the words are plain and unambiguous, and are not susceptible of construction other than that which the words themselves import. "While located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere," means that the policy covered the property only while in that particular building, and did not cover it while it was anywhere else. In Green v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 91 Iowa, 615, the words of the policy were, "while contained in the two-story brick and frame dwelling house," etc. The court, in speaking of other cases to which its attention had been called by counsel for plaintiff, said: "This contract is widely different from those in the cases cited. The evidence shows that the property was kept sometimes in the chapel and sometimes in the house, and parts of it used in both places; and if we assume that the parties, when making the contract, knew of this, we have additional reason for limiting the liability to losses while in the house. It is sufficient to say that the liability is thus limited, and the courts have no right to extend it." This case was followed by Lakings v. Phenix Ins. Co. 94 Iowa, 476, 28 L. R. A. 70. In Bahr v. National F. Ins. Co. 80 Hun, 309, the limitation in the policy was, "while located . . . as described herein and not elsewhere, to wit, . . . while contained in the frame building occupied as a wheelwright shop," etc. The carriage was burned in a livery stable a block and a half away from there. Judgment for plaintiff was had below, and the court said: "This judgment cannot stand. The location of the insured property was a warranty, a breach of which avoided the policy." This rule was recognized by this court in Willey v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 52 Mich. 446, and English v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 55 Mich. 273, 54 Am. Rep. 377. The court below was not in error in directing judgment in favor of defendant.

That judgment must be affirmed.

v.

Edwin C. WILKINSON et al., Assignees of James M. Wilkinson, Deceased, et al., Impleaded, etc., Appts.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Bondsmen or a banker who received city funds are not incompetent after his death, on the ground that they are the real parties in interest, to testify to an arrangement between him and other bankers for dividing the deposits, where the action is by the city for the funds held by the other banks and claimed by his assignee for creditors as part of his estate.

(Per Grant, Ch. J., and Moore, J.)

2. City funds received on deposit by a banker, but redeposited by him in other banks under an arrangement for sharing in the deposits, under which he receives from them the same interest that he pays the city, and agrees that they shall be drawn only to pay city orders, are held in trust for the city as against his assignee for creditors.

(March 6, 1899.)

APPREAL by defendants Wilkinson et al., assignees of James M. Wilkinson, deceased, from a decree of the Circuit Court for Marquette County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to reach funds deposited by decedent in certain banks as being trust funds to which petitioner was entitled as against decedent's assignees for creditors. Affirmed.

Statement by Grant, Ch. J.:

James M. Wilkinson, deceased, was a private banker in the city of Marquette. Shortly before his death, and on January 22, 1898, he made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors to the defendants, Edwin C. Wilkinson and Albert E. Miller. The assignment contained no schedule of assets. On April 29, 1897, the petitioner, the city of Marquette, entered into an agreement with Mr. Wilkinson for the care and custody of its funds upon the execution and delivery of a bond in the sum of $75,000, with sureties, to be approved by the common council. The material part of this agreement is as follows: "The said James M. Wilkinson agrees to receive and safely keep all such moneys and funds of said city as may be offered or deposited by said city and the treasurer thereof, and to reimburse and pay the same to said city, the treasurer thereof, his successor in office, or whoever may be lawfully entitled to receive the same, whenever called for; and to pay interest on such moneys and funds so deposited with him at the rate of 2 per cent per annum on all daily balances which shall at the close of business each day equal or exceed the sum of two thousand dollars ($2,000), but no interest to be paid on any balance for any day in which said balance shall at any time fall below the sum of $2,000; all said interest to be paid on the 1st day of July next, and quarter-yearly thereafter, or at any other time when the account may be closed. It is mutually agreed by and between the respective parties hereto that the said James M. Wilkinson shall at all times keep a true and just account of all moneys and funds deposited by the said city and the treasurer thereof, as aforesaid, and render to said treasurer monthly statements thereof; and that the said James M. Wilkinson shall at all times honor and pay all proper drafts and checks of the said city and the treasurer thereof, as aforesaid, to the amount of the moneys and funds so deposited with him as aforesaid." A bond was executed and approved by the common council, signed by C. H. Call, S. R. Kaufman, E. H. Towar, and A. Matthews as sureties. Messrs. Call and Kaufman were officers of the defendant savings bank, and E. H. Towar an officer of the defendant national bank. The bond referred to the contract, and was conditioned that Wilkinson should "well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, on demand, to said city corporation, or proper officer thereof, or person entitled thereto, all such sums of money as shall be deposited with him by said city treasurer." The city and Mr. Wilkinson had made similar contracts for the years 1895 and 1896. The three banks had entered into an agreement by which all real competition for the keeping of these funds was prevented. Each bank put in a bid with the understanding that Wilkinson should bid 2 per cent as interest for the funds deposited, that the other banks would make lower bids, and that he should deposit one third of the funds in each of the other banks, and that each bank should pay him 2 per cent on such deposits,—the same which he paid the city. It was also agreed that no funds should be drawn from these two banks except to pay city orders. The arrangement between Wilkinson and the banks was carried out in good faith, and at the date of the assignment there was on deposit in each of said banks the sum of $10,000. Each bank kept the account in the name of James M. Wilkinson. When Mr. Wilkinson applied to Mr. Call and the others to sign his bond, they objected. He then stated to them his agreement with the other banks, and that the money so deposited would reduce their liability to one third of the city funds, the money that was to be retained in his own bank. It was upon this assurance, and the understanding that it would protect the sureties of the amount so deposited, that the bondsmen executed the bond. Mr. Wilkinson nonestly and faithfully kept his agreement, and drew from these banks only such funds as were necessary to pay city orders, simultaneously drawing the like amount from each bank. It appears from the finding and opinion of the circuit judge that Mr. Wilkinson's liabilities at the date of the assignment were $130,000; that his assets were scheduled at something over $200,000, and appraised at about $146,000. It is insisted on the part of the assignees that these funds in question are a part of the general assets of Mr. Wilkinson's estate, and should be divided equally among his creditors. It is the contention of the city that they are trust funds; that they were deposited as such, and therefore belonged to the city. The defendant banks admit their obligation to pay the funds in their possession, but refused to pay them over except upon an order of the court of chancery, insisting that the assignees are not empowered to carry out the trust except as so authorized. The assignees instituted suits at law against the banks for the recovery of these funds, and recovered a judgment against the First National Bank for the money in its possession. At this stage in the proceedings this petition in chancery was filed, and further proceedings in the suits at law restrained. The object of this suit is to have the character of these funds declared, and the right thereto determined. The case was heard upon pleadings and proofs taken in open court, and decree entered for the petitioner, declaring that they were trust funds, and that the petitioner was entitled to them.

Messrs. George P. Brown and Charles R. Brown for appellee.

Messrs. Clark & Pearl for First National Bank.

Mr. George Hayden for Marquette County Savings Bank.

Grant, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two questions are presented: 1. Five witnesses testified to the arrangement between Mr. Wilkinson and the banks for the deposit of these funds. Three are the bondsmen. It is insisted that their testimony is incompetent under How. Ann. Stat. § 7545, upon the theory that they are the real parties in interest, and are therefore excluded from testifying to matters equally within the knowledge of the deceased. Who are the real parties to this controversy, so as to make them "opposite parties," within the meaning of the statute? The estate of Mr. Wilkinson is not interested, because it is not concerned in the distribution of the fund. It cannot be depleted by establishing this agreement. Neither will it be increased thereby. The assignees, in any event, would receive this money only to pay it out, either to the general creditors or to the cestui que trust. They are not, therefore, opposite parties, within the meaning of the statute. The banks are not interested, because, in any event, they must pay the money. They are, therefore, not opposite parties. The bondsmen are only contingently interested. They may or may not become liable. Should the assets be sufficient to pay all the liabilities,—and there is nothing upon this record to show that they are not,—no liability will attach. In any event, they are only liable for such deficit as may remain after the distribution of the entire estate among the creditors. It is true, they might be sued upon the bond before the estate is distributed, and in that event they would be subrogated to the rights of the city in the estate. This is a controversy between the creditors alone, to wit, the city and the other creditors; and the reason upon which the statute is founded, excluding testimony, does not apply. McClintock's Appeal, 58 Mich. 152; Broton v. Bell, 58 Mich. 58. The contingent liability of the bondsmen does not render them opposite parties within the meaning of the statute, or disqualify them from testifying. Schofield v. Walker, 58 Mich. 96; Latourette v. McKeon, 104 Mich. 156.

2. Are these trust funds? The character of the fund in Wilkinson's bank, as between him and the city, is not here in controversy. Nor is it material that the city had no knowledge of the arrangement with the other banks. Cestuis que trust are not debarred from enforcing a trust through ignorance of it at the time of its creation, but may enforce it whenever they ascertain its existence. Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, 31 Am. Rep. 446. It is urged that this agreement is void as against public policy. If this be granted, neither Wilkinson, nor the banks, nor the bondsmen could take advantage of it. The city alone could rescind it on this account. It has not chosen to do so, and no other party can complain. It is also clear that Wilkinson's assignees have no other or better title to these funds than did Mr. Wilkinson in his lifetime. Mr. Wilkinson had deposited these funds with the other banks as the city's money, to be paid out only for city purposes. They were not regular deposits to be drawn upon generally by Wilkinson, but were special deposits to be drawn upon for a special object. The funds had passed beyond Wilkinson's control, except under the terms of the agreement. Had Mr. Wilkinson given his check upon either of these banks to pay his personal debts, would the banks have been legally bound to pay? If the banks had been garnished for the personal debts of Wilkinson, could the garnishee suit be sustained? To so hold would be in direct violation of the express terms of the agreement, and defeat the very purpose for the deposit of these funds. If it be granted that the main purpose was to protect the bondsmen, the city is not thereby estopped to seek the fund thus deposited, and compelled to look to the bondsmen. Suppose the bondsmen had become irresponsible. The city would certainly then have a direct interest in the funds. It is, however, elementary that the cestui que trust may pursue his funds regardless of any security he may have by way of bonds. 43 L. R. A.

To apply another test, suppose these bondsmen had declined to sign the bonds unless Mr. Wilkinson would deposit with them two thirds of the city funds, to be kept by them, and paid out only on his check or order to pay city liabilities. Here the main purpose undoubtedly would be to protect the bondsmen. Upon an assignment for the benefit of the creditors, would the bondsmen be compelled to return the money to Mr. Wilkinson's assignees, to be distributed among the general creditors, rather than to devote them to the special purpose for which they were deposited? If not, then certainly there is no difference in principle when the funds are deposited with a third person to secure the bondsmen. Wilkinson, the banks, and the bondsmen saw fit to agree that, as fast as Wilkinson received the city's moneys, two thirds thereof should be deposited with the defendant banks, first, to preserve them for the benefit of the city, and second, to secure the bondsmen. The transaction was legitimate, and impressed upon the funds the character of a trust. The banks were under obligation, both moral and legal, to hold the funds, and pay them out for the specific purpose agreed upon. We think our conclusion is clearly within the principle established by the following decisions: Sherwood v. Central Michigan Sav. Bank, 103 Mich. 109; Wallace v. Stone, 107 Mich. 190; Sunderlin v. Mecosta County Sav. Bank (Mich.) 4 Det. L. N. 1115, 74 N. W. 478, and authorities there cited; Cleveland C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hawkins, 79 Fed. Rep. 29; Montagu v. Pacific Bank, 81 Fed. Rep. 602; Libby v. Hopkins, 104 U. S. 393. 26 L. ed. 769; People v. City Bank, 96 N. Y. 32; Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, 31 Am. Rep. 446; Re Gaffney, 146 Pa. 49; Davis v. Ney, 125 Mass. 500; Reiff v. Horst, 52 Md. 255. The death of Wilkinson terminated the agreement with the city. It was a personal contract, and not assignable. The court of chancery has jurisdiction to determine the rights of the parties, and direct the completion of the trust.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

Hooker, J.:

We concur in the conclusion reached by the Chief Justice. We are of the opinion that the evidence, aside from that given by the bondsmen, clearly establishes the trust. We do not, therefore, pass upon the question whether the testimony of these bondsmen was admissible under the statute.

CONSOLIDATED ELEVATOR COMPANY,

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. The bill of lading for a cargo of wheat provided that any deficiency in the amount of the cargo (delivered by third party from its elevator) should be paid for by the carrier, and any excess in the amount should be paid for by the shipper to the carrier. Held, when the carrier paid the shipper for such a deficiency, the former was subrogated to any rights which the latter had to recover for such deficiency from the keeper of the elevator.
2. Held, the legislature, by § 7675, Gen. Stat. 1894, intended to make conclusive the action of the state weighmaster in weighing wheat at terminal elevators in certain cities, notwithstanding the provisions of § 7706.
3. But held, it is not constitutional for the legislature to make such weighing conclusive, but the same can be impeached only when the party complaining was himself free from fault or negligence, and when it is demonstrated by clear, strong, and satisfactory evidence that there was, in fact, a substantial mistake in the weighing.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County denying motion for new trial after verdict directed for defendant in an action brought to recover a deficiency in a quantity of wheat which had been delivered by defendant for transportation on one of plaintiff's boats. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Searle & Spencer, for appellant: In case a part of the cargo was not delivered it was due to a mutual mistake.

A mutual mistake is a mistake reciprocal and common to both parties where each alike labored under the same misconception of facts.

If a mistake did occur as plaintiff contends then the defendant has 1,062 bushels of wheat that does not belong to it; and its refusal to deliver it to or make it good after demand constituted a conversion for which this action will lie.

Gen. Stat. 1894, § 7648; Addison, Torts, 461; Adams v. Castle, 64 Minn. 505.

The defendant was a bailee. It had received the wheat in store and issued its warehouse receipts. It was obliged to deliver the wheat on the surrender of the receipts. They were surrendered and canceled.

The vessel becomes surety for delivery of the full amount of the grain expressed in the bill of lading and under the law is compelled to do so or make good the deficiency.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff is a common carrier of freight on the Great Lakes, between Duluth and Buffalo. Defendant owns and operates a public elevator at the dock in Duluth, in which the wheat of different parties is stored, commingled in a common mass. On October 20, 1896, Spencer, Moore, & Co. proceeded to ship from Duluth to Buffalo, on plaintiff's steamship, the Vega, 97,587 bushels of wheat. This wheat was stored in said elevator, and, while being delivered from the elevator to the ship, was weighed out by the assistant state weighmaster, under the laws of Minnesota. The cargo of wheat was delivered at Buffalo, but it is claimed that it fell short in weight, and that, by reason of mutual mistake in weighing the wheat at Duluth, 1,062 bushels less than the required amount were delivered on board the ship. The bills of lading delivered by plaintiff to Spencer, Moore, & Co. contain the following provisions: "All the deficiency in cargo to be paid for by the carrier, and deducted from the freight, and any excess in the cargo to be paid for to the carrier by the consignee." When the wheat was delivered at Buffalo to Spencer, Moore, & Co. the consignees, they deducted from the freight the sum of $869.04, the market value of the 1,062 bushels; and plaintiff brought this action to recover this amount from defendant. On the trial the court ordered a verdict for defendant, and, from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

1. We are of the opinion that, by reason of said clause in the bill of lading, plaintiff was an insurer that the amount of wheat called for had been delivered to it, and would be redelivered at the end of the route; and, when plaintiff paid the consignee for the deficiency, any cause of action held by the consignee therefor against defendant passed, by subrogation, to plaintiff.

2. Defendant claimed it had delivered the amount called for by the bills of lading. Elevator receipts for that amount were surrendered at the time. On the trial, plaintiff offered to prove that there were in fact delivered from the elevator to the ship, at Duluth, 1,062 bushels less wheat than the bills of lading called for. Defendant objected to the offer, and the court sustained the objection. This is assigned as error. Section 7675, Gen. Stat. 1894, provides: "Said state weighmaster and assistants shall, at the places of St. Paul, Minneapolis, Duluth, and St. Cloud, supervise and have exclusive control of the weighing of grain and other property which may be subject to inspection, except when otherwise ordered or directed by the party shipping the same, and the inspection of scales; and the action and certificates of such weighmaster and his assistants in the discharge of their aforesaid duties shall be conclusive upon all parties, either in interest or otherwise, as to the matters contained in said certificates." It seems that the trial court held that, under this section, the result arrived at by the state weighmaster in weighing this wheat at Duluth is conclusive, and cannot be questioned in this action. In answer to this, appellant cites § 7706, which is a part of the same act, and reads as follows: "Said weighmaster and assistants shall give upon demand to any person or persons having weighing done, a certificate under his hand and seal, showing the amount of each weight, number of car or cars weighed, if any, the initial of said car or cars, place where weighed, date of weighing and contents of car. And it is hereby provided that said weighmaster's certificate shall be admitted in all actions, either at law or in equity, as prima facie evidence of the facts therein contained, but the effect of such evidence may be rebutted by other competent testimony." These two sections are in pari materia, and must be construed together. They are in some respects in direct conflict with each other, but that conflict must be reconciled if it is reasonably possible to do so. Section 7675 does not attempt to make anything conclusive but the weight ascertained and the certificate of that fact, and does not provide for certifying to other facts. Section 7706 provides for certifying to a number of other facts, such as the number of cars, the initials of the car or cars, the contents of the car or cars, and the place where weighed. When these additional facts are certified to, the certificate itself is only prima facie evidence of any fact therein certified. But, if the weight is proved by competent evidence other than the certificate provided by section 7706, the intent of the statute is that such weight shall be conclusive.

3. But is it competent for the legislature to make the weight thus ascertained absolutely conclusive? We are of the opinion that it is not. The legislature cannot in this manner provide for the arbitrary exercise of power, so as to deprive a person of his day in court to vindicate his rights. And the law which closes his mouth absolutely when he comes into court is the same, in effect, as the law which deprives him of his day in court. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 452; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1050; Graves v. Northern P. R. Co. 5 Mont. 556, 51 Am. Rep. 81; Moore v. State, Denny, 55 Ind. 362, 363; Wantlan v. White, 19 Ind. 470. But we must give to the legislative intent the utmost effect which the Constitution will permit. The statute in question is a police regulation. The business of storing and handling grain in such an elevator is affected with a public interest, is merely a link in the chain of commerce, and may be regulated by the legislature to a very considerable extent. See Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 126, 24 L. ed. 84. The legislature has the right to give to the act of the weighmaster in weighing grain a high character as evidence, and to provide that such act can be impeached only when the party complaining or the party under whom he claims was himself free from fault or negligence, and when it is demonstrated by clear, strong, and satisfactory evidence that there was in fact a substantial mistake in the weighing. No trivial error or trivial variation between different weights is sufficient to impeach the weighing of the state weighmaster; but the alleged error in this case is 1,062 bushels in a total of 97,587, and that is sufficiently substantial.

In our opinion the case is not exactly parallel to one where the parties, by voluntary contract, provide for an umpire to decide on the matters which will arise between them. There the decision of the umpire can only be impeached for fraud or such gross mistake as would imply bad faith or a failure to exercise an honest judgment. Leighton v. Grant, 20 Minn. 345 (Gil. 298); St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. v. Bradbury, 42 Minn. 222; Langdon v. Northfield, 42 Minn. 404; Shaw v. First Baptist Church, 44 Minn. 22. Under the statute, the party running the elevator has no option as to whether or not the state weighmaster shall weigh the grain; and, in our opinion, the state cannot force an umpire upon such party against his will, and then close his mouth, so that he cannot show that the umpire has made a substantial mistake, whether that mistake is the result of fraud or bad faith, or merely of negligence. Under the Constitution, no sound distinction can be made on the difference between a case of bad faith and a case of mere negligence. If a gross error has been committed, and his mouth is closed by the statute, he will be deprived of his property without due process of law, whether the error is the result of bad faith or not. True, in this case, the party running the elevator is not the one who is complaining. The plaintiff is enforcing merely the rights of the shipper, with whom, under § 7675, Gen. Stat. 1894, it is optional whether the grain shall be weighed by the state weighmaster or not. The law does not force this statutory umpire onto the shipper. The umpire is one of his own selection; and it may be contended that, as to him, the case is the same as that of a case where the parties voluntarily agreed on an umpire, and that, therefore, he cannot impeach the weighmaster's decision without showing fraud or such gross mistake as will imply bad faith. But the statute never intended to make the weighing conclusive as to the shipper, and not conclusive as to the party operating the elevator. In this respect the rights of the parties should be held to be mutual and reciprocal, and the weighmaster's decision no more conclusive as to the one than it is as to the other. The legislature never intended to give the party running the elevator an advantage in this respect. The weighing contemplated by the statute is a weighing in the course of delivery, and as a part of that delivery. There are three parties to the transaction,—the shipper, the elevator keeper, and the state weighmaster, who is umpire for the other two. In this case the weighmaster was acting as umpire for the shipper and defendant; but, by reason of said clause in the bill of lading guaranteeing the weight, the plaintiff stepped into the shoes of the shipper in attending to the weighing and delivery of the wheat. Then, if plaintiff can, by clear, strong, and satisfactory evidence, prove the alleged error as a demonstrable mistake of fact, and can further prove that it was not guilty of any fault or negligence which contributed to that error, it should have been allowed to do so. Plaintiff should have been allowed to introduce the offered evidence.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

STATE of Missouri, ex rel. Morris HEZEL et al.,

v.

Charles C. BLAND et al.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A judge has sat in a case so as to be entitled to dissent from the decision and cause the case to be certified to another court on the ground of a conflict of decisions, notwithstanding the fact that he has not had any consultation with the other judges on the merits of the case, where he was on the bench when the case was argued and submitted, and afterwards agreed with the other judges that the decision should be withheld for a time, and on learning of a decision

NOTE.—The decision in the above case as to when a judge may be regarded as sitting in a cause seems decidedly novel.

As to power of one of several judges in a case to act without consultation, see also Butts v. Armor (Pa.) 26 L. R. A. 213.

rendered by them in his absence promptly sent to the judge who wrote the opinion a memorandum stating that it was in conflict with another decision, and that a motion for rehearing ought therefore to be granted, in addition to which he filed a dissenting opinion pending the motion for rehearing, and was on the bench, but not consulted, when his associates overruled that motion in accordance with an agreement they had previously made and of which they had notified him.

2. A judge may be considered as sitting in a case without taking part in it at every stage.

APPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel respondents to certify and transfer to the Supreme Court a cause in which that court had rendered a decision which one of the judges therein sitting is alleged to deem contrary to a previous decision of the Supreme Court. Writ awarded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hiram J. Grover and Denis Devoy, for relators:

"A judge sitting in a case" must be one to whom a case has been submitted for decision; that is to say, for the application of the law to the facts, which are produced before him. Such application of law to facts may be made without either oral or written argument, and without consultation with anyone, as is done in the circuit courts.

Judge Biggs did sit in this case within the true spirit and meaning of § 6 of the Amendments to the Constitution of 1884. Upon his dissenting opinion being filed in the case, asking that the case be certified to this court, that should have been done.

The filing of the opinion of Judge Bland concurred in by Judge Bond, on the 21st day of June, 1898, did not constitute a decision of this case.

The rule of the court of appeals provided that in any case in which an opinion has been filed the party against whom the issues were found might within ten days from the rendition of the opinion, file an application for a rehearing.

The filing of that application for rehearing suspended the opinion, and there could be no decision of the issues in the case until the application for rehearing should have been overruled.

State, New York L. Ins. Co., v. Phillips, 96 Mo. 573.

Mr. Adiel Sherwood, for respondents:

A judge is not "sitting" in "any cause or proceeding" within the meaning of § 6 Amend. 1884, who merely hears an oral argument on the part of appellant, who knows nothing of the facts contained in the record, who never saw any brief on behalf of appellant (and none were filed by respondents), and who is absent from the state when the majority of the court discusses the facts contained in the record, and considers the law applicable thereto, and agrees upon and hands down an opinion announcing their conclusion and judgment.

A motion for rehearing does not affect the judgment entered in an appellate court as a result of its announced opinion.

Andrews v. Hovey, 124 U. S. 694, 31 L. ed. 557; Ex parte Craig, 130 Mo. 594; Sparks v. Knight Templars & M. Life Indemnity Co. 61 Mo. App. 117.

A motion for a new trial does not affect the judgment entered upon the verdict, because an execution may issue with a motion for new trial pending and not determined.

St. Francis Mill Co. v. Sugg, 142 Mo. 358; Ex parte Craig, 130 Mo. 594.

It is true that where a motion for rehearing is filed after the close of the term under a special order for that purpose or under a general rule authorizing a motion for rehearing within a certain fixed number of days, and the motion under such rule is filed after the close of the term and the mandate is held up, that the judgment is in a sense continued and the matter carried over to the term following when the motion for rehearing is overruled; but this is necessary because a vacation of court intervenes.

Childs v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 43 L. R. A.

117 Mo. 417; State, New York L. Ins. Co., v. Phillips, 96 Mo. 570.

But where a motion for rehearing is filed during the same term, the only purpose of said motion being to correct errors of law, such motion does not have any effect upon the judgment, and simply holds back the mandate, unless the motion for rehearing is sustained, in which event there is generally merely a reargument of the case, and then if the court reaches the same conclusion as before there is simply an announcement of the overruling of the motion for rehearing.

Any two of the judges of the St. Louis court of appeals constitute a quorum of the court, and exercise all of the powers and functions of the court.

Mo. Const. art. 6, § 14.

There is every presumption in favor of the correctness of the judgment or action of an appellate court.

Ex parte Craig, 130 Mo. 594; State, Hyatt, v. Smith, 105 Mo. 6.

The judgment of a court of record is always presumed to have been regularly rendered.

Herndon v. Hawkins, 65 Mo. 265; Bouldin v. Ewart, 63 Mo. 330; Small v. Field, 102 Mo. 119; State v. Duestrow, 137 Mo. 76.

The word "cause" and the word "proceeding," in § 6 of the Amendment of 1884, mean practically the same thing.

It cannot be contended that the motion for rehearing was a "cause or proceeding" within the meaning of this section, and that Judge Biggs was "therein sitting" and deemed the decision upon such motion contrary to some "previous decision" of this court, because in the latter part of this section it is provided that the "cause or proceeding" and the "original transcript" therein shall be certified and transferred to the supreme court, and manifestly there is no original transcript of a motion for rehearing.

Blyew v. United States, 13 Wall. 595, 20 L. ed. 643.

The word "case" conveys the precise meaning of the word "suit."

New Brunswick S. B. & Canal Transp. Co. v. Baldwin, 14 N. J. L. 442; State v. Caffey, 6 N. C. (2 Murph.) 320.

"Action on proceeding" is one by which some relief is sought against another.

Re McCausland, 52 Cal. 568.

"Proceeding" is equivalent to suit or action.

Hildreth v. Hopewell Twp. Overseers of Poor, 13 N. J. L. 5.

A judicial proceeding is a hearing and determination.

Robertson v. Barbour, 6 T. B. Mon. 528.

The presence of a judge is absolutely necessary. He certainly cannot be a sitting judge in any cause when he is absent in a distant state; nor can he be a sitting judge when the cause in which it is claimed he is sitting has long since been decided and the judgment of the court entered of record and a motion for rehearing filed, when the majority of the members of the court had agreed in consultation that the motion for rehearing should be overruled and this consultation and agreement took place before the third judge made his appearance, and then sent a note to the majority of the judges in which he took the position that the motion for rehearing should be sustained.

Re Saline County Subscription, 45 Mo. 52, 100 Am. Dec. 337.

"Sitting in a cause" as applied to a judge, must refer to him when he is exercising judicial power, acting as judge.

It was the duty of the judge to have been personally present in court, and to find judicially the facts upon which his conclusion was based.

State v. Jefferson, 66 N. C. 312; Johnson v. Lewis, 1 Rich. Eq. 391; Cook v. State, 8 Tex. App. 666; Crane v. Camp, 12 Conn. 464; St. Louis, K. & S. R. Co. v. Wear, 135 Mo. 259, 33 L. R. A. 341.

A judgment is not merely what is entered on the record; that is the evidence of the judgment: but it is what is ordered and adjudged by the court.

A motion for rehearing in an original proceeding is similar in principle to a motion for a new trial in the circuit court, except that the right to move for a new trial in the circuit court is given by statute, and the motion for rehearing depends on the practice of the appellate court.

The mere filing of a motion for new trial, or rehearing, constitutes no impediment to the judgment or decree.

Valliant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application for mandamus to compel respondents, who are judges of the St. Louis court of appeals, to certify and transfer to this court a cause in which that court has rendered a decision which it is alleged one of the judges therein sitting deems contrary to a previous decision of this court. The respondents in their return say that the judge who deems the decision contrary to a previous decision of this court did not sit in the case and for that reason they refuse to certify it up to this court.

There is a motion on file by respondents to strike out certain evidence, but it will not be necessary to pass on the motion, since it will not be necessary to look into the evidence; the petition and return to the alternative writ show admitted and undisputed facts sufficient for a determination of the case; from which sources we gather the following facts:

At the March term, 1897, a suit was pending in the St. Louis court of appeals from the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, wherein the Barber Asphalt Company, plaintiff below, was appellant, and Morris Hezel and others, the relators herein, defendants below, were respondents. The cause came on for hearing in the St. Louis court of appeals on March 26, 1897, before the Honorable Charles C. Bland, the Honorable William H. Biggs, and the Honorable Henry W. Bond, then and now constituting that court. All three of those judges were on the bench at the time, and the cause was then argued by counsel and duly submitted to the court and taken under advisement. After the case was submitted, without consultation on its merits it was assigned to Judge Bland to prepare an opinion. Afterwards and before an opinion was prepared the three judges in consultation together agreed that because they were informed that a cause was then pending in this court involving the same questions of law, it would be advisable to withhold a decision of the case they had until they should see the decision of this court in the case they were informed was here. The opinion of this court in that case reached the court of appeals June 7, 1898; then, pursuant to the understanding, Judge Bland turned his attention to the case in question, and prepared an opinion which, after consultation with Judge Bond, Judge Biggs being absent, was, on June 21, delivered as the opinion of the court, directing a judgment reversing the judgment of the circuit court and remanding the cause; when the opinion was delivered from the bench, only Judges Bland and Bond were present; the opinion is signed by Judge Bland, and this memorandum at the foot "Judge Bond concurs, Judge Biggs absent."

On June 30, within the time allowed by the rules of the court, relators, defendants in that suit, filed a motion for rehearing; on July 5, during the same term, and before the motion for rehearing was overruled, the three judges present on the bench, Judge Biggs delivered a dissenting opinion in which he cited the case of Verdin v. St. Louis, 131 Mo. 26, and therein stated that he regarded that as the last controlling decision on the subject involved, and that the majority opinion filed June 21, was in conflict with that decision, and requested that the cause be certified to the supreme court. The action of the court on that request is expressed in its record of July 5, as follows:

"Now at this day there is filed a dissenting opinion by Judge Biggs, asking that this cause be certified to the supreme court of this state, but as Judge Biggs was not sitting, and took no part when the opinion and judgment were rendered herein by this court on the 21st day of June, 1898, reversing and remanding this cause, a majority of the judges of this court are of opinion that no ground for certifying this cause exists within the meaning of § 6 of the Amendment to the Constitution of Missouri, limiting and defining the jurisdiction of this court;" after which the motion for rehearing was overruled. Immediately on the refusal of the court to certify the case, as Judge Biggs had requested, the relators by their counsel then present asked leave to file a motion to that effect; but the court refused their request, and then adjourned for the term. It is stated in the reply, and, without looking into the evidence, for the purpose of this suit we will take it for true, that there was never any consultation on the merits of the case between Judge Biggs and the other two judges; that after the majority opinion was filed, and while the motion for rehearing was pending, Judge Biggs sent a written memorandum to Judge Bland in which he stated that he considered the majority opinion in conflict with the decision in Verdin v. St. Louis, 131 Mo. 26, and he was in favor of sustaining the motion for rehearing, but Judge Bland by similar means informed Judge Biggs that Judge Bond and himself had previously talked the matter over and had agreed to overrule the motion and that would be the order; then Judge Biggs, without further interchange of views on the subject with the other two judges, or either of them, prepared his dissenting opinion, which was delivered on July 5.

The only question presented for our consideration by this record is, Did Judge Biggs sit in that case?

Judge Biggs was on the bench when the case was argued, and submitted and taken under advisement; the case then rested as much on his conscience as on that of the other judges; its assignment to another judge in no sense withdrew the responsibility from him; he counseled with the other members of the court on the wisdom of waiting for further light on the subject from this court; within a few days after the majority opinion was delivered, and during the same term, and while the motion for rehearing was pending, he communicated to the writer of the opinion his views, and cited a decision of this court which he thought was being contravened, and expressed his opinion that the motion for rehearing ought to be sustained. It appears from the return that Judges Bland and Bond, before the return of Judge Biggs, consulted on the motion for rehearing; and after due deliberation came to the conclusion that it ought to be overruled. But it by no means follows that because they had agreed on the opinion in the first instance they would agree to overrule the motion for rehearing. A motion for a rehearing is a very serious stage of the case; it often saves the court from error and the party from wrong. The case is pending for all there is in it, in the appellate court, until that motion is overruled. State, New York L. Ins. Co., v. Philips, 96 Mo. 573. Now, suppose Judges Bland and Bond had become divided in opinion, one favoring granting and the other denying the motion, then Judge Biggs's vote would have accomplished an entire change in the case; yet his vote was as valid when it stood alone for the rehearing, as it would have been if it had been cast with the majority.

While the motion was pending, if Judge Biggs thought the decision was wrong it was his duty as a judge to exert his influence to correct the error. 'It is not necessary that a judge of an appellate court should be in session with the other judges at every stage of the case in order to enable him to perform any duty which his mind and conscience dictate in reference to the case; and it is not necessary that he should take part in every stage before he can be considered as sitting in it.

Under the facts of this case, Judge Biggs is to be adjudged as having sat in it; was entitled to file his dissenting opinion, and, upon his statement that he deemed the majority opinion contrary to the decision he mentioned, that court ought to have certified and transferred the cause to this court in accordance with the requirement of § 6 of the Amendment of 1894, of the Constitution.

The peremptory writ of mandamus is awarded.

All concur except Judge Burgess, absent.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

NEW JERSEY ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE, & WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, by John G. McCullough et al., Receivers.

(61 N. J. L. 287.)

- *1. One who has a fixed reversionary interest in personal property has the right to sue one who is not in possession thereof for such an injury by him thereto as will depreciate its value when it comes to his hands.
2. A bailor when he makes a bailment for hire locatio rei parts with the possession to the chattels to the bailee; but, if any permanent injury be done to a chattel by a third party during the continuance of the bailment, he may maintain an action against such third party, whether an action might or might not be maintained against such party by the bailee for trover, trespass, or replevin to control the immediate possession.
3. A bailor need not look alone to his bailee for a wrong by a third party in connection with the bailee done to the chattel which is the subject of the bailment for hire. If the bailee assumes to pledge or sell the bailed goods as his own, such an act amounts to a conversion, and the bailor may at once bring his action against the third party in whose possession the property is found. While a mere misuse may not terminate the bailment, yet, when, by the negligence of the bailee, either alone or in conjunction with the negligence of a third party, the chattel bailed is no longer fit and suitable for, and cannot be devoted to, the use for which it was hired, the bailment is at an end, and bailor can maintain his action for the injury done to it.
4. The servants of the bailee in a bailment for hire are not the servants of the bailor, and he is not responsible to a third party for the negligence of the servants of the bailee in respect to the bailment. The bailee does not stand in the place of the bailor, nor represent him in such relation as to render the bailor liable for the negligent acts of the bailee or his servants or agents; and while, in an action by the bailee for injuries against a third party, occasioned by his negligence, the contributory negligence of the bailee or his servants or agents will constitute a defense to the action, yet in an action by the bailor, who is the owner, against a third party, for injury to the bailment, the negligence of the bailee or his servants or agents is not imputable to such bailor, and will not prevent a recovery.
5. A bailment for hire for use distinguished from a bailment for the carriage of goods by a common carrier.

(November Term, 1897.)

*Headnotes by LIPPINCOTT, J.

NOTE.—The above case is an especially valuable discussion of the liability of a third person to a bailor for injury to property in the hands of the bailee. The somewhat analogous question of the liability of a servant to a third per-

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment entered for plaintiff upon a special verdict in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to property belonging to plaintiff while in the possession of a bailee. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court, which was as follows:

LIPPINCOTT, J.:

In this case the action is brought by the New York, Lake Erie, & Western Railroad Company, by its receiver, against the defendant, to recover damages sustained by the locomotive engine and cars of the plaintiff, in a collision between the locomotive engine and an electric car of the defendant company, at a crossing over a public highway, at Singac, in Passaic county, on September 2, 1895. The locomotive and some of the cars of the train belonged to the plaintiff company, and by it had been hired by the day, and from day to day for use, to the New York & Greenwood Lake Railway Company, which latter company was, with its own engineer, fireman, and employees, running the same over and upon its own roadbed and rails, at such highway crossing, at the time and place of collision. The defendant was a street electric railway company, running along and upon the Little Falls road, which is a public highway from Paterson to Passaic and Rutherford. The tracks of the New York & Greenwood Lake Railway cross this highway at Singac. At the same point, the electric car tracks of the defendant company cross the tracks of the plaintiff railroad company, and the collision between the electric car and the locomotive, while both were in the act of making this crossing, caused the damage to the locomotive and cars of the plaintiff. The cause was tried at the Passaic circuit, together with the case of the New York & Greenwood Lake Railway Company against the defendant, for damage to the tracks of the railroad, and to other cars owned by it, before the same jury, and the evidence is the same as to both cases except as to damages. Both cases were argued in this court at the November term, 1896,—the former case upon a rule to show cause why the verdict, which was for the defendant in that case, should not be set aside, which rule was discharged at the February term, 1897, upon an opinion of the court rendered at that term. 60 N. J. L. 52, 38 L. R. A. 516. In that case, this court, in its opinion, held that there existed no error of the trial court in the admission or rejection of evidence, or in its instruction to the jury, nor was the verdict against the evidence or the weight thereof, nor contrary to the charge of the court. In the cause now in hand the trial justice directed the jury to return a special verdict. The jury were directed to find by their verdict—First, whether the collision or accident occurred by reason of the negligence of the employees of the defendant in charge of and operating the electric car of the defendant company; secondly, whether the negligence of the employees of the New York & Greenwood Lake Railway Company, the bailee of the plaintiff company of the locomotive and some of the cars of the train, contributed to the collision or accident; and, thirdly, what amount of damages had the plaintiff suffered. The jury, by their special verdict, found negligence of the employees of the defendant company causing the accident; also that the negligence of the employees of the New York & Greenwood Lake Railroad Company contributed thereto; and also that the plaintiff company had suffered damage to the amount of $1,475. On this verdict the postea was framed, and the motion now is for judgment thereon.

The right of the plaintiff to recover against the defendant is denied on the ground, first, that, under the verdict finding that the contributory negligence of the New York & Greenwood Lake Railway Company having concurred and co-operated with the negligence of the defendant in causing the injury, therefore the action should be against that company alone, and that for such injury action only can be had against the New York & Greenwood Lake Railroad Company, which was the bailee of the plaintiff of the locomotive and cars, and that it cannot be maintained against the defendant, although its negligence contributed to the injury. This contention involves the question of the right of the bailor against a third party as wrongdoer in relation to the subject-matter of a bailment for hire for use. There is no question but that, for the injury to the actual possession of the bailee, action against a third party will lie only at the suit of the bailee; and the general current of authority appears to be that the bailee can include in such suit damages for the entire injury to the subject of the bailment, but no case is found which denies the right of the bailor to sue and recover for the permanent injury to the property even before the expiration of the bailment. One who has a fixed reversionary interest in property has a right to sue one who is not in possession thereof for an injury to such property which will depreciate its value when it comes to his hands, and is entitled to recover damages to the extent of such depreciation. The owner of a reversionary interest in personal property has the same right of action for an injury thereto as in the case of real property. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 119. The bailor, when he makes a bailment for hire, parts with the right of possession to the chattel; and it has been held that he cannot during the existence of the bailment maintain an action of trespass for its asportation, or trover for its mere conversion, or replevin to recover back its possession against any third person; but it seems to be the accepted doctrine at present that, if any permanent injury be done to the chattel, he may maintain a special action on the case against a third party for injury done by such third party to the reversionary interest, and this seems to be both by reason and authority the rule, whether an action might or might not be maintained by the bailee against such party for trover, trespass, or replevin, to control the immediate possession. Pollock, Torts, p. 432. A person who has let a chattel out to hire may, nevertheless, sue a third party for damages in respect to the permanent injury to the reversionary interest. Addison, Torts, p. 410. In Mears v. London & S. W. R. Co. 11 C. B. N. S. 850, the case was that a barge was let to hire. The defendant, who was not the bailee, was engaged in raising a boiler out of the barge, when the boiler was negligently allowed to fall, destroying the barge. The court held that the plaintiff, who was the owner of the barge, had the right to sue a third party whose negligence caused the injury, and laid down the rule that, although the owner could not bring an action when there had been no permanent injury to the chattel, where there is such permanent injury the owner might maintain an action against the person whose wrongful act had caused the injury. The general rule appears to be that the owner of a chattel which is out on hire for an unexpired term may maintain an action against a third person for a permanent injury thereto. This seems to be the rule whether the bailment has expired or not. Howard v. Farr, 18 N. H. 457; White v. Griffin, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 139; Lexington & O. R. Co. v. Kidd, 7 Dana, 245; Hawkins v. Phythian, 8 B. Mon. 515. A bailor need not look alone to his bailee for a wrong by a third party in connection with the bailee, as respects the contract of bailment. If a bailee assumes to pledge or sell the bailed goods as his own, such an act amounts to a conversion, and the bailor may immediately bring an action of trover or replevin against the third party in whose possession the property is found. Story, Bailm. 9th ed. § 413. In Enos v. Cole, 53 Wis. 235, the right of the action of trespass against a third party to whom the bailee had improperly sold the goods bailed was distinctly recognized. Whether the bailment in the case in hand had expired or not, it seems, can make very little difference. This bailment or hire of this locomotive and cars was presumably by the bailor at its will. A bailment may be determined by the mere efflux of time, as where the chattel is bailed for a stated period. Here the bailment was not for any stated period. It may be determined by the accomplishment of the object for which the thing was bailed, as where the chattel is hired for a particular purpose, or is pledged until the loan is repaid. It may be dissolved by mutual agreement at any time. And either party, as has been said, where the bailment is not for any particular time, may terminate it at will. It may be determined by the total or partial destruction of the subject-matter of the bailment, as where a chattel is lost or is destroyed. It may be also terminated where the bailee disposes of it contrary to the terms of the bailment. In this case the bailment was terminated at the time of the injury, for then it was no longer, under the evidence, fit and suitable for the use which the contract of bailment contemplated. While a mere misuse might not terminate the bailment, yet, when by the negligence of the bailee either alone or in conjunction with the negligence of a third party, it is no longer fit and suitable for the uses for which it was hired, both by reason and all the authorities, the contract of bailment is at an end. It would seem to be clear that, under general principles, a bailor can maintain an action for injury to the property bailed, at the hands of a third party, who is a wrongdoer in relation thereto, especially wherever the injury is of a permanent character. Therefore the contention of the defendant that the right of action was alone against the bailee must fail.

But the right to recover is secondly denied upon the ground that the contributory negligence of the New York & Greenwood Lake Railroad Company, the bailee of the locomotive and cars, is a bar to recovery by the plaintiff company, which was the bailor of the same, and that the contributory negligence of the bailee is imputable to the plaintiff as bailor, and therefore prevents a recovery. It is contended that, in law, the bailee could have included the injuries to the locomotive and cars in his action against the defendant, and that its contributory negligence would have been a complete defense to the action, and, this being so, that this same contributory negligence can be successfully set up against the plaintiff, who is the owner of the property; or, in other words, that the possession by the bailee involves the bailor in all the consequences of the default of the bailee, however much the act of wrongdoing by the third party might be the joint cause of injury to the chattels in the possession of the bailee. The reason of this contention, as it appears to the court, is not apparent or well-founded. It need only be said that a bailment is a contract which is interpreted by the same rules as other contracts. The bailor and bailee are just as independent of each other in regard to the subject-matter as the contract by its terms permits them to be. It is the delivery of a thing in trust for some special object or purpose, upon a contract, express or implied, to conform to the object or purpose of the trust. Story, Bailm. 8th ed. p. 4. This is evidently true as to a bailment for hire to use locatio rei. If not a part of the express contract, the law impliedly engages to allow the full use and enjoyment of the chattel by the bailee, to the extent of the use and enjoyment of the object of the hiring, and for the time hired. This right of the bailee is quite independent of any control by the bailor, but there is also the right of the bailee to have the thing used with care and moderation; to have it applied to the use for which it is hired, and no other; to have it used with reasonable care for its preservation; and to have redelivery when the use to which it is to be devoted is completed or performed, or the bailment has otherwise expired. The bailee is responsible to the bailor for injuries to the subject of the bailment by reason of the negligence of the bailee, and of his servants in the course of his employment, occasioning injury to the property. The general property remains in the bailor, and the bailee only has a special interest for the express or implied objects of the bailment. Under these general principles, now well established as governing the contract of bailment, it would be entirely too artificial to say that no right of action existed by the bailor against a third party as a wrongdoer for injury, by negligence or otherwise, to the chattel which was the subject of the bailment. It is not an answer that the bailee has his right of action for the full injury against the wrongdoer, for the bailee may never choose to seek such a remedy, nor can he be compelled to do so, nor can it be said with any greater reason that the bailor must resort alone to the bailee for redress for the injury, for it may have occurred in spite of the exercise of the full degree of care required of the bailee as in case of theft, by the servants of the hirer, for which he is not, generally speaking, liable, unless there are some circumstances which impute to him a want of due diligence. Vere v. Smith, 1 Vent. 121, 2 Lev. 5; Story, Bailm. 8th ed. § 38, 407. The servants of the bailee are responsible to the bailor for their malfeasance, not because they are the servants of the bailee, but because they are active wrongdoers to the bailment. Lane v. Cotton, 12 Mod. 488; Story, Bailm. 8th ed. § 405; Story, Agency, §§ 309-320. The care or diligence required to be exercised depends upon the nature of the subject, and it rises in proportion to the demand for it; and, when the required care is exercised, the bailee is no longer responsible to the bailor. Therefore, there is nothing in the relation of the bailor and bailee which of itself can prevent the bailor from seeking out the third party as the wrongdoer, and imposing upon him the liability for the results of his conduct to the subject of the bailment. It would seem, upon reason, that there could exist no objection to the joint liability of the wrongdoer and the bailee when the joint negligent act of both caused the injury.

But the defendant distinctly contends that the negligence of the bailee or its servants in the operation of this locomotive and train of cars by reason of this bailment, contributing to the injury, is imputable to the bailor, and prevents a recovery on the part of the bailor against the defendant as a third party, who is a joint wrongdoer with the bailee. This joint negligence by the special verdict is found to have been the cause of the collision and injury, and therefore the case must be considered with the fact of the contributing negligence of the bailee established. In a contract of bailment of things for hire, the bailor is not responsible to a third party for injuries occurring to such third party by reason of the negligent use of the thing hired by the bailee, nor for the negligence of the servants of the bailee in respect thereto. The bailee does not stand in the place of the bailor, nor represent him in such relation as to render the bailor liable for such injuries; nor are the servants of the bailee the servants of the bailor, or in any sense acting for him; and the contract of bailment is in so far entirely an independent one, and the liabilities of the bailor and bailee to third parties are essentially independent of each other. In this case it cannot be contended that the plaintiff company would have been responsible to the defendant if the negligent use of the locomotive by the servants of the New York & Greenwood Lake Railroad had occasioned an injury to the defendant's car at this crossing. This negligence, however much it might be the occasion of the injury to the defendant, could not have rendered the plaintiff company responsible, so long as in this case no act or conduct of the plaintiff company was in question. It did not in fact advise, encourage, or permit in the hands of its bailee the negligent use of this locomotive. The contributory negligence of a third person can only be set up in defense when it is legally imputed to the plaintiff, and its existence must depend upon some connection or relation between the plaintiff and the third person from which such legal responsibility may arise. It is a general rule that it is no justification of the misconduct of the defendant that some third person, a stranger, was also in the wrong. The negligence of the servant in the course of his master's employment is imputable to the master, and so as between agent and principal. But the negligence of one passenger in a car standing alone, inflicting injury upon another passenger, is not imputable to the railroad company, a common carrier of passengers. There must exist concurring negligence in some respect in the railroad company. Sheridan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 39, 93 Am. Dec. 490; Cannon v. Midland Great Western R. Co. Ir. L. R. 6 C. L. 199. If the defendant be negligent, the fact that the negligence of others co-operated or concurred with it in effecting the wrong does not affect the question or measure of liability. Mott v. Hudson River R. Co. 8 Bosw. 345; Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 60 Wis. 141, 50 Am. Rep. 352.

It may be deemed to be settled in this state that the employees of servants of a bailee are not the servants of the bailor in any such relation as to make the bailor liable to third parties for their negligence or misconduct in relation to the thing bailed; as where A hired a coach and horses with a driver from B to take his family on a particular journey, and in the course of the journey, in crossing the track of a railroad, the coach was struck by a passing train, and A was injured. In an action by A against the railroad company for damages, it was held that the relation of master and servant did not exist between the plaintiff and the driver, and that the negligence of the driver, co-operating with that of the persons in charge of the train which caused the accident, was not imputable to the plaintiff as contributory negligence to bar his action. It was further held that for whatever purpose the negligence was invoked, whether as an action for injury done by the driver, or as contributory negligence to bar the action by the passenger against the third person for an injury sustained, the negligence to be imputed to the passenger must be such as arises in some manner from his own conduct. The negligence of the driver without some co-operating negligence on his part cannot be imputed to the passenger in virtue of the simple act of hiring. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Steinbrenner, 47 N. J. L. 161, 54 Am. Rep. 126; Bennett v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. 36 N. J. L. 225, 13 Am. Rep. 435. There is no perceivable distinction between the case in hand and the cases last cited. Both rest upon a contract of bailment for the hire of a thing for use, and although a contract mutually beneficial to each of the parties, they are so independent of each other that the negligence of one cannot be imputable to the other. It is only when the contributory negligence is of such a character, and the third person is so connected with the plaintiff, that an action might be maintained against the plaintiff for damages for the consequences of such negligence, then when the plaintiff brings the action, that negligence is, in contemplation of law, the plaintiff's negligence, and it is justly imputed to him. This relation does not exist between the bailor and bailee under the ordinary contract of bailment. The case of Hawkins v. Pythian, 8 B. Mon. 515, is a case very similar in the application of the principles of law to the one in hand. In this case the plaintiff hired a slave to A, who allowed him to go with B. While B had the slave, he put him on a restive horse, which threw the slave, and killed him. The plaintiff sued A and B together. The verdict was allowed to stand against B, although it was set aside as to A by reason of an erroneous instruction of the court to the jury. The cases cited by the defendant in his argument are mainly based on the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 114, in which the deceased intestate, while alighting from the omnibus in which he was a passenger, was knocked down by the defendant's omnibus, and received injuries from which death ensued. The court held in that case that, if the want of care on the part of the driver of the omnibus in which the deceased was riding in not driving up to the curb to put the deceased down had been conducive to the injury, the plaintiff could not recover, although the defendant's driver had been guilty of negligence. It is sufficient to say that this doctrine has been thoroughly disapproved in this state in the case of New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Steinbrenner, 47 N. J. L. 161, 54 Am. Rep. 126. Before the Steinbrenner Case had been decided, Chief Justice Beasley, in the case of Bennett v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. 36 N. J. L. 225, 13 Am. Rep. 435, had repudiated the doctrine. It has now been overruled in England in the Bernina Case, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 58.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed. 652, also repudiates it. There is a line of cases concerning the peculiar contractual relations between a shipper of goods and the common carrier thereof, locatio operis mercium vehendarum, who is liable to the shipper against all events except the acts of God or the public enemy or the natural wear and tear of the article shipped, and responsible for all the consequences of his conduct as an insurer against loss except from such excepted causes, which hold the carrier alone responsible for injury. The shipper, according to such authorities, cannot recover against a third party for negligence in the care of such goods or injuries to them. The distinction between the relation which exists in law between the shipper and the common carrier of goods and the bailment for hire of a chattel for use is so obvious as not to need discussion. The carriage of goods is by all legal writers classed as a different contract of bailment, having peculiarities and governed by principles characteristic of the relation quite apart from the contract of bailment of chattels for hire. The cases cited by the defendant are Vanderplank v. Miller, Moody & M. 169; Simpson v. Hand, 6 Whart. 311, 36 Am. Dec. 231; Covington Transfer Co. v. Kelly, 36 Ohio St. 86; and Arctic F. Ins. Co. v. Austin, 69 N. Y. 470, 30 Am. Rep. 221. These cases are all cases which arise under the contract of bailment for the carriage of goods and chattels, not by a special, but by a common, carrier. He is treated as an insurer against all but the excepted perils (Jones, Bailm. p. 101); and the shipper cannot look beyond him for liability; and this rule is said to be grounded upon public policy.

I cannot perceive that whether, in respect to this action, the duty of the defendant and the bailee were joint or separate can make any difference. If the same duty of care was due and owing to the plaintiff, then a common neglect of that duty would render them both liable as joint tortfeasors. If the duty to plaintiff was a separate one, which was neglected to be performed by each of them, although the duties were diverse and disconnected, and the negligence of each was without concert, if such neglects concurred and united in causing the injury, the tort still is equally joint, and the tortfeasors are subject to a like liability. Matthews v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 56 N. J. L. 34, 22 L. R. A. 261. The bailee was bound to use reasonable care and diligence in the preservation of the property from injury. The defendant, in the operation of the electric car, was bound to exercise reasonable care in avoiding injury to the property of which the plaintiff was the owner. It would seem that the intervention of the negligence of the bailee could not shield the defendant from injury caused by its own negligence. Both might have been selected as joint tortfeasors, or the action could be maintained against either. The conclusion reached is that the plaintiff had the right to sue either or both these companies for the injuries 43 L. R. A.

arising from their negligence to the locomotive and cars of the plaintiff, and it is not a defense to the action that the accident was contributed to by the negligence of the other. Each is liable upon its own negligence and the negligence of the bailee is not imputable to the plaintiff as a shield to the defendant against recovery.

Judgment must be entered on postea for the damages found by the jury.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

STANDARD FASHION COMPANY, Respt.,
v.
SIEGEL-COOPER COMPANY et al., Appts.

(157 N. Y. 60.)

1. An injunction will lie to prevent a department store from violating its contract with one occupying floor space for the sale of a particular article not to allow to be sold on the premises during the duration of the contract any other make of such article.
2. The fact that enforcement of a contract may require a multiplicity of orders by the court in its endeavor to superintend the business to which it relates does not deprive the court of jurisdiction, but justifies its refusal, in its sound discretion, to exercise it.
3. A complaint which states a good cause of action is not demurrable because it is of the class in which the court may refuse to act owing to the difficulty of enforcing its decree.
4. A bill to enforce specific performance of a contract by a department store giving a certain person the exclusive right to sell a certain article in the store states a good cause of action, although owing to the difficulty attending the enforcement of the decree and the absence of public interest the court may refuse relief.

(October 18, 1898.)

APPPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment of a Special Term for New York County in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce specific performance of a contract to give to plaintiff the exclusive sale of paper patterns in the defendant's store. Affirmed.

Statement by Vann, J.:

The complaint, after setting forth the corporate character of each party to the action, alleges: That the plaintiff and the defendant the Butterick Publishing Company are rivals and competitors in the business of preparing and selling paper dress patterns and designs. That the defendant the Siegel-Cooper Company is engaged in the business of selling at retail all articles required by people for consumption and use, and that it occupies and carries on the greatest department store in the world, covering half a block in the city of New York. That on the 16th of July, 1897, the plaintiff and the Siegel-Cooper Company entered into an agreement, of which, omitting the formal parts, the following is a copy: "The Siegel-Cooper Company is hereby appointed an agent for the sale of Standard patterns and Standard fashion publications for a term of two years from the date the contract goes into effect, and said term to be extended from year to year thereafter until closed by three months' notice in writing by either party. to be given within thirty days after said two years or any one year thereafter. The Standard Fashion Company agrees to conduct at its own expense and risk a pattern department on the ground floor of the Siegel-Cooper Company's store on Sixth avenue and 18th street, New York City, said Standard Fashion Company furnishing its own employees, such employees to be subject to the employees' rules of the Siegel-Cooper Company. The Standard Fashion Company further agrees to furnish, free of charge, not less than 250,000 eight-page fashion sheets, of the kinds sold at $10 per thousand, to the Siegel-Cooper Company, per annum, as long as this contract continues, and to print the advertisements of said Siegel-Cooper Company on front and back thereof without charge, to be changed monthly, if so desired; such fashion sheets to be distributed by the Siegel-Cooper Company from its store, or from pattern counter or any other of the business, without expense to the Standard Fashion Company. The Siegel-Cooper Company to furnish wrapping paper and twine, free delivery, and other store facilities. Said Siegel-Cooper Company agrees not to sell, or allow to be sold, on its premises during the duration of this contract, any other make of paper patterns. Siegel-Cooper Company agrees to pay over to the Standard Fashion Company two thirds of all the moneys received from the sale of patterns and fashion publications, making weekly settlements with the Standard Fashion Company, said Siegel-Cooper Company to make no charge for cashing. The remaining one third to be the remuneration of said Siegel-Cooper Company for the permission to the Standard Fashion Company to conduct said department. The said Siegel-Cooper Company agrees to allow the use of the present pattern fixtures and the present position for paper patterns but in case a change of location should be deemed advisable, such new location not to be less prominent, nor to occupy less space, than the present one, except between Thanksgiving and Christmas of each year. This contract to go into effect either on September 12th or December

As to mandatory injunction for specific enforcement of contract, see note to Moundville v. Ohio River R. Co. (W. Va.) 20 L. R. A. 167. 42 L. R. A.

12th, 1897, according to the choice of said Siegel-Cooper Company, such choice depending upon the question of whether the contract between the said Siegel-Cooper Company and the Butterick Publishing Company, now existing, will be terminated in September or December of this year. The Standard Fashion Company agrees to assume all risk of loss by fire, water, etc., or risk of theft, or other unforeseen damage to or destruction of pattern stock, and to hold the Siegel-Cooper Company harmless in that respect. Said Siegel-Cooper Company to make, at the expense of the Standard Fashion Company, frequent mention of the fact that they are agents for the sale of the Standard patterns in its daily New York newspaper advertisements, and also to allow reasonable display of attractive show cards and signs furnished by the Standard Fashion Company, and subject to the approval of said Siegel-Cooper Company, at convenient places in its store; the expense of such signs to be entirely borne by the Standard Fashion Company." The complaint further alleges that said agreement "as defendant the Siegel-Cooper Company well knew, at the time it was entered into," was for the purpose of securing to the plaintiff the great advantage and prestige to be obtained from the sale of its paper patterns exclusively in said store and to prevent the Siegel-Cooper Company from selling or allowing to be sold on its premises any make of paper patterns other than those of the plaintiff. After alleging willingness to perform on its part, the plaintiff alleged refusal to perform on the part of the Siegel-Cooper Company, and that it has entered into an agreement with its codefendant to sell in said store the paper patterns made by the Butterick Publishing Company, during the whole or part of the term of the agreement made with the plaintiff; that it has given notice that it will not sell the paper patterns of the plaintiff, nor allow the plaintiff to sell its paper patterns in said store, nor permit plaintiff to enter or occupy said store, or any part thereof; that the Butterick Publishing Company knew of said agreement with the plaintiff, and induced the Siegel-Cooper Company to break the same, promising to save it harmless against any recovery by the plaintiff on account of the said breach, and to defend at its own expense any action brought on account thereof; that the plaintiff will be put to irreparable loss and injury if the Siegel-Cooper Company is suffered to break its agreement; that it will be damaged in its business if that company sells the patterns of the Butterick Publishing Company, the rival and competitor of the plaintiff, by loss of the prestige aforesaid, as well as by the loss of receipts from the sales of its patterns in said store in a manner altogether impossible to be compensated for in an action for money damages, and that in no place can the plaintiff obtain the same advantages for the sale of its patterns as in said store. The relief demanded is that the Siegel-Cooper Company be required to specifically perform its contract with the plaintiff, and that both defendants be restrained from selling in said store any paper patterns except those made by the plaintiff "from December 12, 1897, to December 12, 1899, and for three months thereafter." There is also a prayer for damages and general relief. The separate demurrers interposed to this complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action were sustained at special term, but upon appeal the appellate division reversed the interlocutory judgment entered below, holding that, while the plaintiff could not have a specific performance of the contract, as it would impose too great a burden upon the court, still it was entitled to an injunction to enforce a negative covenant of the Siegel-Cooper Company that it would not sell, or allow to be sold, on its premises, during the duration of the contract, any other make of paper patterns. The defendants appealed to this court by permission of the appellate division, which certified the following question: "Does the complaint in this action state facts constituting a cause of action against either of the defendants?"

Messrs. Edward C. Perkins and Thomas M. Debevoise, for appellants:

It does not appear from the complaint that there is no adequate remedy at law.

It is the function of a complaint to furnish the court with premises, not with conclusions.

The principle which deters the court from enforcing the entire contract against only one of the parties also applies, with at least equal strength, to prevent the enforcement of a single term in the contract, and it can hardly be claimed that the granting of an injunction is anything more than the specific performance of a single term of the agreement, or that the right to an injunction depends on any separate principle.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Contracts which require the performance of varied and continuous acts, or the exercise of special skill, taste, and judgment, will not, as a general rule, be enforced by courts of equity, because the execution of the decree would require such constant superintendence as to make judicial control a matter of extreme difficulty. Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 339, 358, 19 L. ed. 955, 961; Beck v. Allison, 56 N. Y. 366, 370, 15 Am. Rep. 430; Gervais v. Edwards, 2 Dru. & W. 80; Blackett v. Bates, L. R. 1 Ch. 117; Fargo v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 3 Misc. 205; Pom. Spec. Perf. § 312; Fry, Spec. Perf. § 69. An exception to this rule, founded upon the rights of the public rather than those of the plaintiff, obtains with reference to contracts relating to the management and control of railroads and other agencies of transportation which enjoy special privileges conferred by statute, and promote the general welfare. Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 47, 34 L. ed. 843, 858; Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. 144 N. Y. 152, 26 L. R. A. 610. When the inconvenience of the courts in acting is more than counterbalanced by the inconvenience of the public if they do not act, the interest of the public will prevail. But even if, upon a trial of the action, specific performance of the contract in its entirety were refused as impracticable, still the bill should be retained as one permitting an injunction, in the sound discretion of the court, to restrain the defendants from violating the negative and severable covenant of the Siegel-Cooper Company that it would not "sell, or allow to be sold, on its premises, during the duration of this [the] contract, any other make of paper patterns" than those of the plaintiff. The learned appellate division, one of the judges dissenting, overruled the demurrers on this ground, holding that the court should extend its remedy as far as it is able, and thus prevent the principal defendant, not only from making money by breaking its agreement, but from inflicting a double wrong upon the plaintiff by depriving it of the right to sell, and conferring that right on a business competitor. We think this is a sound and just conclusion, because it will compel the Siegel-Cooper Company to either perform its agreement or lose all benefit from breaking it, and at the same time will shield the plaintiff from part of the loss caused by the breach, if persisted in. Lumley v. Wagner, 1 DeG. M. & G. 604; Donnell v. Bennett, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 835; Montague v. Flockton, L. R. 16 Eq. 189; Singer Sewing Mach. Co. v. Union Button-Hole & E. Co. Holmes, 253; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 516, 521; Goddard v. Wilde, 17 Fed. Rep. 846; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Union P. R. Co. 3 43 L. R. A.

Fed. Rep. 423, 429; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rogers, 42 N. J. Eq. 311.

The injunction, when granted, may not be absolute, but may be based on some equitable condition that will prevent either party from taking advantage of the other, such as the waiver by the plaintiff of the breach of the contract by the principal defendant. The question raised by the demurrer does not relate to any matter of discretion or propriety, but to the power of the court to grant any relief, conditional or otherwise. We are satisfied with the opinion below upon the subject, and should adopt it as our own without comment, but for a point, not thus far considered, which seems to us a conclusive answer to the demurrers, and which, if overlooked, might lead to some confusion. The action is for the specific performance of a lawful contract, duly executed by both the parties thereto. It is capable of performance by both, and there is no reason for non-performance by either. A court of equity has jurisdiction of such actions, and the complaint sets forth the contract,—readiness to perform on one side, a refusal to perform on the other,—and facts showing no adequate remedy at law. A complete cause of action is, therefore, alleged, and the only reason for not awarding general relief to the plaintiff is that its nature is so complicated as possibly to require a multiplicity of orders by the court in its efforts to superintend the details of an extensive and peculiar business. This fact does not deprive the court of jurisdiction, but justifies a refusal, in its sound discretion, to exercise it. It confers no right upon either party. The court does not refuse to act because the defendants object to its acting, for it would refuse, under the circumstances, if both parties requested it to proceed; but it refuses because the execution of its decree would require protracted supervision. It is the difficulty of enforcing, not of rendering, judgment that causes it to hesitate. The office of a demurrer is to sweep away a defective pleading, and in the case before us it attacks the substance of the complaint; yet the complaint is good in substance, for it sets forth a cause of action in equity. While it is true that the court, in its discretion, may not hear the cause, or, after hearing, may refuse relief owing to the difficulty of enforcing its decree, still this does not make the complaint defective, nor authorize a general demurrer, which "must be founded upon an absolute, certain and clear proposition that, taking the charges in the bill to be true, the bill would be dismissed at the hearing." Beach, Modern Eq. Pr. § 225. Upon the facts before us, it is in the power of the court to enforce the agreement the same as in the case of railroad contracts, but the difficulties attending the enforcement are so great that the court would ordinarily refuse to undertake it, as there is no public interest involved. As there was complete jurisdiction and a perfect cause of action against both defendants, the demurrers must be overruled. Coatsworth v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 156 N. Y. 451.

The order of the appellate division should be affirmed, with costs, and the question certified answered in the affirmative.

All concur.

v.

Henry H. HEERT et al., Appts.

(158 N. Y. 306.)

1. A statute for protecting labels of labor unions, which applies to every locality in the state and embraces every association or union of workmen or women, is a general law and in no sense local or private.
2. But one subject is indicated in the title of an act for the protection of skilled labor and the registration of labels, trademarks, names, brands, or devices covering the products of such labor associations or unions.
3. A statute authorizing associations or unions of workmen to adopt labels or devices to distinguish the products of their labor does not make an unjust discrimination against nonunion workmen.
4. The boycotting of nonunion laborers, to deprive them of the legitimate fruits of their labors, cannot be deemed the purpose for which a statute for the protection of union labels was procured, so as to make the statute invalid.

(February 28, 1899.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York county in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin defendants from using Union labels on cigars. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John A. Straley and Morris S. Wise, for appellants:

Chapter 385 of the Laws of 1889 is unconstitutional and void, because it grants an exclusive privilege to a private association in contravention of the provisions of the Constitution, § 18, art. 3.

A fundamental error at the very basis of plaintiff's claim is that he assumes that the creation and registration of the label gives his association an exclusive right therein.

He confounds certain rights given under the common law with label rights under the statutes, as if the invention of a label would give rights therein which a court of equity would protect.

trademark rights as a manufacturer or dealer, but it does not follow that because he could do so, an association of independent members could do the same and transfer the trademark or label from person to person.

United States v. Steffens, 100 U. S. 82, 25 L. ed. 550.

A trademark cannot be acquired at common law unless the owner is a maker or selector of an article of traffic which he himself places upon the market and sells as his, using the trademark to indicate its origin, or ownership, or to indicate the particular business or place of business of a company doing a particular business.

The statute, if it supports plaintiff's claim, must be held to be creative, and make the rights of property in a label or trademark registered thereunder a species of property per se, and this without reference to whether at common law the trademark is valid or not.

An entirely new cause of action has thus been created by this statute. The ownership of a trademark is an exclusive right.

Re Union Ferry Co. 98 N. Y. 150.

Why should discrimination be made in favor of this body of so-called union workmen as against the nonunion operatives of the shops or of other manufactories who do not exclusively employ union workmen, and why should selling premiums be placed by this state upon such union-made product by the official sanction of a union merchandise label and trademark?

Schmalz v. Wooley, 56 N. J. Eq. 649.

Chapter 385 of the Laws of 1889 is a private bill, and is unconstitutional and void because within the condemnation of § 16 of art. 3 of the Constitution.

Chapter 385 of the Laws of 1889 is unconstitutional and void because the act is contrary to public policy in that it unjustly discriminates in favor of the labor of members of associations or unions as against that of nonunion workmen.

The implication and inference are absolute that the obvious intention of the language employed in the label in suit was to attack all nonunion labor.

By placing such terms on their label even though in a negative form, the union virtually branded and stamped all other forms of labor as being of a kind properly subject to condemnation, and the goods of all other workmen as being goods which should not be purchased or used.

New York & R. Cement Co. v. Coplay Cement Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 212.

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff, as president of the Cigar Makers' International Union of America, under the provisions of chapter 385 of the Laws of 1889, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from using an alleged imitation of the union's label, a copy of which had been filed in the office of the secretary of state under the provisions of that law, and also for an accounting for profits. The Cigar Makers' International Union of America is a voluntary unincorporated association, consisting of a large number of persons, who are practical cigar makers, residing in the United States, with its principal office located at Buffalo. The purpose of their organization is the promoting of the mental, moral, and physical welfare of its members by assisting them to obtain labor at remunerative wages, and by affording them pecuniary aid in case of sickness, and generally, to maintain a high standard of workmanship. They adopted a label upon blue paper, with an ornamental border, containing the following:

Sept., 1890.

Issued by authority of the Cigar Makers' International Union of America. Union Made Cigars. This certifies that the cigars contained in this box have been made by a first-class workman, a member of the Cigar Makers' International Union of America, an organization opposed to inferior ratshop, coolie, prison, or filthy tenement-house workmanship. Therefore we recommend these cigars to all smokers throughout the world. All infringements upon this label will be punished according to law.

G. W. Perkins,
President C. M. I. U. of America.

On one end was a copy of the seal of the union, and on the other end a place was reserved for a local stamp. After the passage of the act in question, they caused a copy of this label to be filed in the office of the secretary of state. The defendants are cigar manufacturers in the city of New York, and are not members of the union. They caused to be printed counterfeits of the blue label adopted by the union, and pasted it upon boxes containing the cigars manufactured by them, and then, through their agents, sold their cigars to the public, with the intent, as has been found, to defraud the union and the purchasers and to impose upon the public. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and a decision was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, awarding a perpetual injunction against the defendants, and for damages and costs.

It is claimed, on behalf of the appellants, that the label had been abandoned by the union; that it contained matter libelous and defamatory, which a court of equity would not protect; and that the statute in question had been repealed. These questions were fully considered by the learned appellate division, and we fully concur with the views of that court, as expressed in the prevailing opinion, with reference thereto. The only questions which we deem it necessary to here consider are those raised with reference to the constitutionality of the act.

The statute is as follows: "Sec. 1. Every union or association of workmen or women, adopting a label, mark, name, brand, or device, intended to designate the products of the labor of members of such union or association of working men or women, shall in order to obtain the benefits of this act, file duplicate copies of such label, mark, name, brand, or device in the office of the secretary of state, who shall, under his hand and seal, deliver to the party filing or registering the same a certified copy and a certificate of the filing thereof, for which he shall receive a fee of $1.

"Sec. 2. Every union or association of workmen or women adopting such label, mark, name, brand, or device, and filing the same, as specified in the first section of this act, may proceed, by suit in any of the courts of record of the state, to enjoin the manufacture, use, display or sale of counterfeits or colorable imitations of such label," etc.

It is claimed that the act in question is void for the reason that it grants an exclusive privilege to a private association, in contravention of the provisions of the Constitution. Const. art. 3, § 18. That section of the Constitution, so far as material, provides as follows: "The legislature shall not pass a private or local bill in any of the following cases. . . . granting to any private corporation, association, or individual any exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever. . . . The legislature shall pass general laws providing for the cases enumerated in this section, and for all other cases which in its judgment may be provided for by general laws."

It will be observed that the prohibition contained in this provision of the Constitution has reference to private or local bills, and that it requires the legislature to pass general laws providing for the cases in which private and local bills are prohibited. The question, therefore, arises as to whether the act in question is a general law or a private and local bill. It is entitled "An Act for the Better Protection of Skilled Labor, and for the Registration of Labels, Marks, Names, Brands, or Devices Covering the Products of Such Labor of Associations or Unions of Workmen or Women." There is nothing in the title or the provisions of the act that in any manner limits its provisions to any particular locality of the state or to any designated association or union of working men or women. Instead, the provisions are all general, including every locality in the entire state, and embracing every association or union of workmen or women existing or that may be thereafter organized. It is in no sense local or private, but is in every sense a general law.

Again it is claimed that the act is within the condemnation of § 16 of article 3 of the Constitution, which provides that "no private or local bill, which may be passed by the legislature, shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." We have already shown that the act is a general law, and not a private nor local bill. It, consequently, is not brought in conflict with this provision. Furthermore, we think but one subject is mentioned in the title, and that is the better protection of skilled labor by the registration of labels, etc., covering the products of such labor.

Finally, it is insisted that the act is unconstitutional and void, for the reason that it is contrary to public policy, in that it unjustly discriminates in favor of the labor of members of associations or unions as against that of nonunion workmen. The questions arising under this contention are more serious and require deliberate consideration. While private and local bills, granting to a private corporation, association, or individual any exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever, are prohibited, the Constitution authorizes the legislature to pass general laws under which grants may be made to corporations, associations, or individuals of an exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise. An exclusive privilege or franchise is, therefore, authorized, if obtained under general laws. Among the exclusive privileges and franchises which have been made the subject of grants to private corporations, and with which we are all familiar, are those made by municipal governments, under the authority of general laws, of the right to occupy streets or highways for the construction and operation of street railroads. In all of these grants there is, of necessity, discrimination. Some particular corporation is singled out, to which the grant is given, and which thereafter enjoys the exclusive privilege of operating its railroad through the streets or highways specified in the grant; but, the grant being authorized, the discrimination is not unlawful. It is not contrary to public policy, for the reason that the constitution is the foundation upon which the public policy of the state is based. It embodies the policy of our government. It authorizes that which is politic, and prohibits that which is deemed impolitic. Where, therefore, the Constitution grants, or authorizes a grant through legislative action, of an exclusive privilege, it must be deemed to be in accord with the policy of the state. As we have seen, the label authorized was by a general, and not a local, act. No particular association or union has been given the exclusive privilege of adopting a label but every association or union of every kind of working men or women is given the right to adopt its own label, which may indicate its own workmanship. It consequently follows that whatever discrimination there may be is authorized, and therefore not unjust, and that the privilege granted under the general law is in accord with public policy.

We are aware that the courts of sister states have had trouble with similar legislation in their states, that very much has been written upon the subject, and that the conclusions reached by the courts in the different states have widely differed. We have not thought it profitable to enter upon an elaborate discussion of these cases. The questions here presented arise under our own Constitution and are confined within narrow limits. We have not overlooked the intimation that the passage of this act was procured for the purpose of enabling union labor organizations to boycott nonunion laborers, and to deprive them of the legitimate fruits of their labors. We cannot, however, assume that such was the purpose and intent of the legislature, or that the association of which the plaintiff is president will resort to acts which are unlawful and criminal. The act allows the members of the union to send the products of their labors into the markets of the country, marked in such a way as to indicate the character of their workmanship. This is legitimate and proper. It is a right that the law accords to every manufacturer. We must assume, therefore, that the legislature, in passing the act, had in view the lawful and legitimate purpose, and that it did not contemplate that the provisions of the act might be used for illegitimate purposes. These views render it unnecessary to consider the question as to whether the label was a valid trademark at common law.

No question is raised as to the right of the plaintiff to prosecute the action as president of the association.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of North Carolina

v.

John P. MONROE, Appt.

(121 N. C. 677.)

A druggist who drops croton oil on candy for a customer in quantity sufficient to produce serious injury if taken into a person's system, knowing or reasonably believing that it is intended for a practical joke on someone and not for medicinal purposes, will be guilty of assault upon one injured by its administration by way of joke.

(December 21, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Union County imposing upon him a fine for alleged assault and battery. Affirmed.

Ernest Barrett was given some quinine in lemonade as a practical joke by W. W. Horn. He informed Horn that he would get even with him by giving him a dose of croton oil. The same evening Horn gave to Barrett some candy which made Barrett sick and it subsequently appeared that the candy contained croton oil. It appeared that Horn had gone into a drug store in which defendant was a clerk and asked him to drop a dose of croton oil into a piece of candy, which defendant did. Defendant denied that he knew that the oil was wanted for the playing of a practical joke; he denied that he had told Barrett that he fixed the dose for him, or that he had said that Horn told him he wanted it "for a fellow," which statement another witness testified that he had made, although he admitted that he knew of the giving of the quinine. The defendant asked the court to instruct that in no view of the case can the jury convict unless they find beyond a reasonable doubt that Monroe knew at the time he sold Horn the oil that Horn intended to give it to Barrett for an unlawful purpose. This was refused, and the court instructed that if defendant sold Horn an unusual dose of croton oil, and he administered it to Barrett, who took it, and it had a serious and injurious effect upon him, and the defendant knew, or had reason to believe and did believe, that it was intended for Barrett or some other person by way of trick or joke, and not for a medicinal purpose, defendant would be guilty of assault and battery.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Covington & Redwine and E. Y. Webb, for appellant:

The character of the weapon, and the nature of the damage are not so set out in the bill as to show that the former was deadly, and the latter serious; and the evidence shows that the drug administered was oftentimes used in larger doses, and fails to disclose any serious damage.

The circumstances under which the oil was sold, the fact that it was put up in an unusual way, that it was not labeled, that no inquiry was made as to its intended use, that no representation was made that it was intended for a legitimate purpose, that defendant knew that Horn had recently given the prosecutor quinine as a joke, the fact that Horn told defendant that he wanted it "for a fellow,"—all justified the jury in finding that the defendant knew, or had every reason to believe, and did believe, at the time, that the dose was intended for Barrett, or some other person, by way of a trick or joke, and not for a medicinal purpose.

Faireloth, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Will Horn administered to Ernest Barrett a dose of croton oil, and the oil had an injurious effect on Barrett. Defendant admits he sold the oil to Horn, and at his request dropped it into a piece of candy, but says he did not know that these parties were playing practical jokes on each other, and did not know for what purpose Horn wanted the oil. Another witness testified that defendant said that Horn said he wanted the oil "for a fellow." Defendant denied saying this. Another witness testified to the quinine episode, and to Barrett's and Horn's tricks with each other. Defendant testified that he knew that a day or two before Horn had given Barrett a dose of quinine as a joke, in lemonade. There were other witnesses on these matters. Defendant is indicted for an assault on Barrett. If guilty, he must be so as a principal, not as an accessory. His guilt, then, depends upon whether he knew, or had reason to believe, that the dose was intended for Barrett or some other person as a trick, and not for medicinal purposes. The whole evidence was submitted to the jury, who rendered a verdict of guilty. His honor instructed the jury that when the defendant sold the oil, if he "knew or had reason to believe, and did believe, that it was intended for Barrett or some other person by way of a trick or joke, and not for a medicinal purpose, the defendant would be guilty of assault and battery." He also charged that it was not necessary that it should be a poisonous or deadly dose; that it was sufficient if it was an unusual dose, likely to produce serious injury. To this instruction we see no objection, and we think it covers the substance of the defendant's prayers proper to go to the jury. There was no exception to the evidence. For duties of druggists, see Code, §§ 3143-3145.

Affirmed.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

Ex parte Charles BATTIS.

(.....Tex.....)

An ordinance prohibiting hackmen and draymen from stopping their vehicles on certain streets except when actually engaged in receiving or delivering passengers or goods is not within charter authority to prevent the encumbering of streets, and is unreasonable and void.

(December 22, 1898.)

A PPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the District Court for Tarrant County refusing to discharge him upon writ of habeas corpus from custody to which he has been committed for alleged violation of an ordinance of the City of Ft. Worth. Petitioner discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wilson Gregg for relator.

Mr. W. D. Williams for respondent.

Henderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Relator was arrested for an alleged violation of a city ordinance, and sued out a writ of habeas corpus before the district judge, who, after hearing the evidence, remanded the prisoner, and he prosecutes this appeal.

The complaint is as follows: "In the Name and by the Authority of the City of Ft. Worth. In the City Court. Before the undersigned authority, this day personally appeared L. P. Moore, who, being duly sworn, upon oath deposes and says that on the 17th day of November, 1898, and before the filing of this complaint, one Charles Battis, within the corporate limits of the city aforesaid, who was then and there using a certain street carriage and hack for the purpose of conveying passengers from one part of the city to another for hire, and who did then and there stop, stand, and detain said carriage and hack on Main street, of said city, when not actually engaged in receiving and delivering passengers and goods and merchandise, in violation of the ordinances of said city in such cases made and provided, contrary to the law of the state of Texas, and against the peace and dignity of the city of Ft. Worth," etc.

The portions of the charter of the city of Ft. Worth introduced in evidence are as follows: Section 53 provides that the city council, among other things, shall have power "to prevent the encumbering of the streets, alleys, sidewalks, and public grounds with carriages, wagons, carts, hacks, buggies, or any vehicle whatsoever." Special Laws 1889, p. 76. Section 53a provides that the city council shall have power "to license, tax, and regulate hackmen, draymen, omnibus drivers, baggage-wagon drivers, and drivers of vehicles of every kind . . . and to regulate stands for vehicles," etc. Special Laws 1891, p. 16. The ordinance passed by the city of Ft. Worth under said provisions of the charter is as follows: Chapter 7, art. 55: "Any person or persons owning or using any street carriage, hack, or other vehicle for the purpose of conveying passengers, goods, wares, or merchandise from one part of the city of Ft. Worth to another, for hire, who shall stop, stand, or detain any such carriage, hack, or vehicle on Main or Houston streets, or upon any cross streets running east and west between said Main and Houston streets, commencing with Weatherford street on the north, and ending with Seventh street on the south, or in front of any public hotel in said city, except when actually engaged in receiving or delivering passengers, goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not less than $5 nor more than $25" etc. Appellant proposed to introduce witnesses to show the conditions surrounding said streets constituting the locus in quo, in connection with his proposition that the ordinance in question was an unreasonable exercise of the power of said city. The court, however, refused to hear testimony on the subject. We think the bill is defective in failing to state the facts desired to be proved. So, we will consider the question of the reasonableness of said ordinance on this phase as presented by the charter and ordinance.

There is no question that the authority granted to the city by the legislature in its charter to regulate the use of the streets and alleys and public grounds, and prevent the encumbering of the same by carriages, wagons, etc., is ample; that is, the legislature, in the charter, distinctly gave to the city of Ft. Worth the power to regulate the use of the public streets, alleys, etc., by vehicles. "Where the power to legislate on a given subject is conferred, and the mode or its exercise is not prescribed, then the ordinance passed in pursuance thereof must be a reasonable exercise of the power, or it will be pronounced invalid." See 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 328, and note 1. It is contended here, however, that the ordinance in question, prohibiting the stopping of vehicles on said streets of Ft. Worth for all purposes, except loading and unloading, is an unreasonable exercise of the power of the municipality, and is in excess of the charter right to regulate the use of said streets, and to prevent the encumbrance thereof. It is the general doctrine in this country that every ordinance of a corporation must be either authorized by the charter of such corporation, or one of the incidental powers of the corporation, which is implied; furthermore, that every by-law must be reasonable, and the reasonableness of a by-law is a subject to be passed on by the courts. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 319, and authorities cited in note. It is held, furthermore, that the courts will be liberal in upholding an ordinance, and, if its reasonableness be doubtful, it will not be held void. Ex parte Gregory, 20 Tex. App. 210, 54 Am. Rep. 516. Ordinances, to be reasonable and lawful, must not be oppressive, must be impartial, fair, and generally may regulate, but not prohibit, matters of common right. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 320-323, 325. Now, applying these rules to the above ordinance, does it appear that the same was a reasonable exercise of the power of the municipality under its charter? The ordinance in question, it will be noted, inhibits the stoppage of vehicles on said streets in the city of Ft. Worth for any purpose, except to receive and discharge freight or passengers. Under it, no matter what the emergency might be, a person stopping a vehicle, outside of the exceptions, would violate the ordinance, and be subject to punishment. A great many exigencies might occur for a person to stop a vehicle for the transportation of goods or passengers, which he might be driving, entirely reasonable; but under the ordinance, if he delay but a moment, he would be subject to a fine. There can be no question that, under a proper ordinance, the municipality has authority to prevent the encumbering or obstruction of its streets, alleys, and highways by vehicles, and, to that end, can regulate their use, can fix stands for vehicles, and permit them to use no other place as stands. This would be a proper exercise of its power to regulate; but it occurs to us that the sweeping declaration in this ordinance, inhibiting the stoppage of vehicles for any purpose, outside of the exceptions mentioned, is oppressive, and is in contravention of common right, and so is unreasonable, and, in our opinion, is not authorized by the charter.

We therefore hold the city ordinance void, and relator is ordered discharged.

Hart, P. J., absent.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

Courts.

The question whether a judge is to be deemed to be sitting in a certain case or not is considered in a case which holds that he did sit in the case and is entitled to dissent and cause the case to be certified to another court for conflict of authority, although he has no consultation on the merits of the case with the other judges, where he was on the bench when it was argued and submitted, and on learning of its decision in his absence notified the judge who wrote the opinion that it was in conflict with a decision of the supreme court, and that a rehearing ought to be granted, in addition to which he filed a dissenting opinion pending the rehearing, and was on the bench, but not consulted, when his associates overruled the motion for rehearing, as they had previously concluded to do, and notified him of their purpose. (Mo.) 845.

The question of the personal liability of the judge of an inferior court for decisions not justified by law is decided in exoneration of the officer in a case in which an unlawful sentence was imposed under an illegal ordinance which the court held valid. (Ga.) 630.

Officers.

Residence in a suburb before its annexation to a city is held equivalent to residence within the city for the purpose of determining the eligibility to a city office of the resident on annexation. (Ky.) 699.

A change in the time of electing officers so that more than four years would elapse between elections is held not to violate a constitutional provision against creating an office the tenure of which shall be longer than four years, where, if the officers hold more than four years, it will be by virtue of another constitutional provision by which they hold over until their successors qualify. (Ind.) 408.

Requiring signers of nomination papers to pledge themselves that they will vote for the candidates named therein is held to be no infringement of the constitutional right to vote. (Ohio) 90.

Official certificates.

A statute making the certificate of a state weighmaster of the weight of grain delivered from a public elevator absolutely conclusive, when the owner of the elevator is compelled to have the grain weighed by him, is held unconstitutional. (Minn.) 843.

Corruption of city council.

The corruption of a city council in passing a resolution is held to be a defense to the city in an action against it based on the resolution, and such a resolution to settle and compromise the claim of a contractor is held to be an administrative, and not a legislative, act. (N. Y.) 678.

Municipal liability.

City waterworks are held to be within the rule which makes a city liable for negligence in respect to property which it owns in its private capacity as distinguished from that which it holds as a governmental or public agency. (Or.) 435.

Personal injuries caused by the shooting of fireworks, firearms, etc., on the public streets, with the consent of the authorities, are held to give no right of action against the town. (W. Va.) 295.

See infra, II., as to county warrants.

Parks.

A city which has dedicated for park purposes land conveyed to it for a common or street, subject to reversion if used for other purposes, is held to violate its trust by granting the right to lay a railroad across it and then attempting to abandon the park and confirm the title of the reversioner. (Ala.) 376.

Public landing.

The lease by a city of a part of a public landing to a private person is held invalid. (Pa.) 502.

Fisheries.

A statute limiting to taxpayers the right to take oysters in public waters is held unconstitutional. (Tex.) 615.

A statute authorizing fish commissioners who have placed fish in a stream to prohibit fishing therein for three years, and also making the waters public for five years more, is held constitutional. (Vt.) 290.

Public funds.

A private bank is held not to be a "regularly organized bank," within the meaning of a statute as to the deposit of public funds. (Ill.) 644.

City funds deposited by a banker who received them from the city in other banks, under an arrangement to share the deposits with them, whereby they were to be drawn only to pay city orders, are deemed to be held for the city in trust, as against his assignees for creditors. (Mich.) 840.

Highways—eminent domain.

Poles for electric-light wires, authorized by a town, in a country highway, for the lighting of which the town has made a contract, are held not to constitute an additional burden upon the fee. (N. Y.) 672.

The change of a county road to a city street, caused by incorporating a city, is held not to make a new and additional burden which requires new condemnation. (Or.) 444.

Following the great weight of authority, it is held that an electric motor railway is not an additional servitude on a highway. (Ala.) 233.

Locating an electric street railway within 7 feet of a building is held to give the abutting owner no right to compensation. (Ky.) 554.

The consent of abutting owners is held not to be necessary for the use by one street-railway company of the tracks of another company which has a contract therefor with the former. (N. Y.) 236.

A railroad company is held under the obligation to alter the grade of its crossing at its own expense when a highway is laid across it requiring a different grade. (Ga.) 638.

Ordinance as to use of streets.

An ordinance prohibiting hackmen and draymen from stopping their vehicles on certain streets except when engaged in receiving or delivering passengers or goods is held unreasonable and void. (Tex.) 863.

Taxes.

The forfeiture of land under the West Virginia Constitution for five years' failure to enter it for taxation is held to constitute due process of law because this practice existed before the provision of the Federal Constitution on this subject was adopted. (W. Va.) 727.

A lessee's interest in oil wells while the oil remains in place in the earth is held not to be taxable as personal property. (W. Va.) 725.

A municipal tax on business or property so situated that no protection or benefit can be received from the municipality is held unconstitutional as a taking of private property for public use without just compensation. (Utah) 81.

Dormitories and dining halls of a college are held to be buildings exclusively occupied as a college, within the meaning of a statute exempting college property from taxation. (Conn.) 490.

A school created and maintained by voluntary contributions but open to all children of every creed, color, race, or condition free of charge, is held to be within the constitutional provision for the exemption of purely public charities. (Pa.) 489.

Assessments.

See also infra, VIII.

Frontage assessments on abutting property for the expense of sprinkling streets are held valid, even when the expense of sprinkling other streets is paid by the city. (Mass.) 834.

The assessment of abutting owners for new sidewalks or drains required because of a change of street grade is held unconstitutional in South Carolina, where the Constitution requires all taxes for a public purpose to be assessed on all the property in the corporation. (S. C.) 101.

Competition is held not to prevent similar circumstances and conditions within the meaning of a statute regulating railroad charges. (Ky.) 541.

Restriction of business.

A statute prohibiting persons from engaging in the business of ticket brokers unless they are duly appointed agents of transportation companies is held unconstitutional. (N. Y.) 264.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

A promise to pay when the debtor feels able is held equivalent to a promise to pay when he knows he is able, and, although he is the judge of that fact, his judgment must be honestly exercised. (Md.) 219.

A written contract to extend the time for payment of a mortgage, when made without any new consideration, is held invalid and of no effect to relieve a surety. (N. Y.) 685.

note, to the effect that it should be given back on the surrender of stock, is treated as constituting, with the note, a single transaction with mutual and dependent stipulations. (Me.) 449.

Statute of frauds.

An instrument written and signed by one person for another in the latter's presence and by his direction, though without any written authority from him, is held sufficient under the statute of frauds. (Ill.) 529.

An oral agreement with children who become members of the family of the promisors, that, in consideration of their services and also of their giving them the proceeds of their property, the promisors will leave them all their property at death, is held to be taken out of the statute of frauds. (Minn.) 427.

Quitting work.

Threats excusing an employee for quitting service in breach of his contract are held not to relieve him from the liability for damages caused his employer by such breach, although they entitle him to recover for the net benefit conferred by his services. (Wis.) 810.

Public policy.

A contract for the sale at an advance, of the bid or interest of a successful bidder at a judicial sale, before its confirmation, is held void on grounds of public policy, unless the advance inures to the benefit of the parties to the suit. (Va.) 146.

Exclusive right.

The right of a railroad company to give one hackman the exclusive use of its station grounds to solicit passengers is denied. (Miss.) 134.

Curing invalidity.

A statute taking away the defense of usury is held to be valid, as it does not change the contract, but only removes an obstacle to its enforcement. (Iowa) 689.

Brokers.

A broker employed by a person who is acting for an undisclosed principal, but whose agency is disclosed after the broker has brought a person to take an option, but before a binding contract is made, has no claim for commissions against the agent. (Tex.) 593.

Lease.

The flow of water from upper to lower rooms of a leased building because of defective plumbing which the lessor refuses to remedy within a reasonable time after notice is held to constitute a breach of the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment. (Mont.) 125.

Bonds.

The loss of money taken from the pockets of a man who is drunk is held not to be included in the damages occasioned by the sale of liquor to him, within the meaning of a statute requiring dramshop bonds. (Ark.) 143.

County warrants.

County warrants which have been indorsed. "Not paid for want of funds," and thereby become interest-bearing by force of statute, are held to be contracts for interest at the rate then fixed by law, so that the rate cannot be reduced by a subsequent statute. (Or.) 634.

Bills and notes.

The negotiability of a note is held to be unaffected by a clause retaining title to property for which the note was given, with the right to retake it in case of nonpayment. (Mich.) 277.

The indorsement of commercial paper by an executor in the name of the estate, describing himself as executor, is held insufficient to make him personally liable. (Mass.) 831.

The indorsement of a bill of exchange by a person bearing the same name as the payee is held to pass no title if it is done with the intent to perpetrate a fraud. (Ill.) 654.

Demand on a receiver pendente lite of an insolvent bank is held insufficient to bind an indorser of a negotiable certificate of deposit issued by the bank before its insolvency. (Or.) 128.

Insurance.

Insurance on a fire engine and similar property while contained in a fire-engine house, and not elsewhere, is held not to cover the property when burned several hundred feet from that house, while being used in an attempt to extinguish a fire. (Mich.) 833.

While a building is in course of construction by a contractor it is held that the owner has an insurable interest, although the contract would cast the loss on the contractor in case of fire. (N. Y.) 664.

A member of a mutual benefit association is held to be under no liability to pay assessments after he lets his policy lapse, as the contract is purely unilateral. (Ill.) 648.

Death caused by the rupture of an artery while one was reaching over a chair to close a window shutter is held not to be accidental, where he did not slip or fall, and nothing happened which he had not planned, except the rupture of the artery. (Iowa) 693.

An insurance policy containing no stipulation as to suicide is held not to be avoided, as against a beneficiary named therein, by the suicide of the assured. (Iowa) 536.

Carriers.

See also infra, VI.

The liability of a carrier for injury to a passenger by explosion of a lamp at a hotel is denied in a case where the conductor of a train which had taken the passenger past her destination placed her in the hotel to wait for a return train. (Ga.) 402.

One who attempts to ride on a ticket which he knows does not, on its face, entitle him to a ride, although he thinks the limitation expressed upon it is unreasonable, is held to have no right of action for ejection, if he refuses to pay fare. (Iowa) 136.

The mere stamping or printing of a limitation upon a railroad ticket, or the posting of notices in waiting rooms, is held insufficient to bind a passenger in the absence of actual notice. (Tenn.) 140.

Small packages of merchandise which a passenger does not take for use on his journey or in accomplishing its purpose are held not to be within his common-law right to take baggage in a passenger car, but when long acquiescence in the taking of such packages, and provision for them, have made a regulation of the carrier, it is held that this cannot be rescinded without reasonable notice. (N. J.) 284.

A contract for interstate transportation, which by mistake names a less rate than that scheduled, is held to be governed by the interstate commerce law, and to be insufficient to prevent the carrier from recovering the full schedule rate notwithstanding a state law to the contrary. (Ala.) 385.

The failure of a railroad company to furnish cars to a shipper when duly demanded is held to create a liability for the damages sustained by him under Texas statutes, but the statutory penalty is denied when the cars were demanded at a switch at which the company had no agent. (Tex.) 225.

Telegram.

The sending of a message to a telegraph office by telephone is held not to make the telegraph agent the agent of the sender because of a regulation that he must receive messages only in writing unless the sender had knowledge thereof. (Mich.) 280.

DECISIONS.

DOMESTIC RELATIONS. PERSONAL CAPACITY.)

Abandonment.

The fact that a small quantity of ore was not free from foreign substances as required by a contract for successive shipments was held not to justify an abandonment of the entire contract. (Ala.) 382.

Forfeiture.

Moneys paid on a contract for land of which time is the essence are held to belong to the vendor on default by the vendee without excuse, and cannot be recovered by the latter without excusing his default. (Cal.) 199.

III. CORPORATIONS; ASSOCIATIONS; FRANCHISES.

See also infra, VI., as to Illegal Construction.

The right of a private party to maintain a suit in equity against a corporation to prevent its wrongful assumption of a name belonging to the former is sustained against the contention that such suit is in effect to annul the corporation, and can only be brought by the state. (R. I.) 95.

The fact that a certificate of stock in a corporation is issued in the name of a secretary is held to be insufficient to put a party upon inquiry as to whether the secretary is rightfully the owner of it, and if such certificate is issued by the proper officers one who purchases it in the open market has good title to it as against a corporation, even if it was fraudulently issued. (Ohio) 777.

Building and loan association.

The acceptance of a negotiable order by a building and loan association when nothing was due to the drawer is held binding in favor of a bona fide holder when the association had power to execute negotiable paper for some purposes. (C. C. App. 7th C.) 419.

Labor unions.

A statute to protect labels of union workmen is held to make no unjust distinction against nonunion workmen, and the court refuses to assume that it was procured for the purpose of boycotting nonunion workmen. (N. Y.) 858.

State corporation.

The right to sue a state board of managers of World's Fair Exposition without the consent of the state is upheld, where the board is authorized to contract and funds are furnished it, while the state expressly declares that it will not be liable for any expenses or indebtedness of the board. (Ky.) 703.

Warehousemen.

A licensed warehouseman is held to have no right to deal in grain and store it in the licensed warehouse, and this rule is held applicable to the stockholders of a corporation so licensed. (Ill.) 658.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

The fact that a man's consent to marriage was yielded reluctantly under pressure of the wife's relatives and in the belief that it was his duty to marry her because he had wronged her by seduction is held insufficient ground for annulling the marriage. (La.) 814.

The effect of the subsequent marriage of the parents of an illegitimate child and the acknowledgment of the child by the father to make the child legitimate under the terms of the statute is held to be the same in case of an adulterine bastard as in other cases. (Ohio) 772.

A woman living with a man with whom she has entered into a void marriage without any fraud on his part, but while she has another husband from whom she has not obtained a legal divorce, is held to have no right of action for damages because of a venereal disease contracted while living with him. (Idaho) 207.

The acceptance of a divorce decree by the defendant, who remarried, is held insufficient to estop him against contesting the validity of a subsequent ex parte proceeding wherein judgment is opened and a decree for alimony entered. (C. C. App. 1st C.) 618.

A mortgage of an infant's property, made under order of court, is held void, when its sole purpose, as appeared from the papers, was to pay the debt incurred by the guardian in carrying on business without authority. (N. Y.) 256.

V. PERSONAL CAPACITY.

See also infra, VII.; as to Deed for Lunatic.

The liability of an insane person for negligence is again presented in the case of the captain of a ship who has chartered it and becomes mentally deranged by over exhaustion. (L. R. A.)

during a storm. It is held that he is not liable for subsequent want of skill or care in navigation while so deranged. (N. Y.) 253.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.

A druggist who drops croton oil on candy for a customer as a joke is held liable for an assault. (N. C.) 861.

Members of a trade association who combine to induce or compel other persons not to deal or enter into contract with a person who will not join the association or conform to the prices fixed by it are held liable to him for the injury thus caused to his business. (Ill.) 797.

An unusual case presenting a new line of reasoning holds that the withdrawal of patronage from a person by members of an association is illegal because of the element of coercion, although they united with the association voluntarily, when a by-law under which they acted imposed a penalty for its violation. (Vt.) 803.

Procuring a divorce is held not to prevent a woman from maintaining an action against a third person for prior alienation of her husband's affections. (Wash.) 114.

Innkeepers' liability.

Lack of fire escapes on a hotel when required by ordinance is held not to create any liability for the death of a guest by fire, unless the death was due to the lack of the fire escapes. (Tenn.) 185.

Injury to servant.

A railroad company operating a single-track road is held not to be negligent in failing to give those in charge of a train moving in the same direction telegraphic information as to their relative positions. (Conn.) 305.

The same is held in another case, which also decides that the reasonableness of rules adopted by railroad companies for the movement of trains is a question of law for the court. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 349.

Carriers.

See also supra, II.

The liability of a carrier for a malicious assault on a passenger by its employee is sustained on the ground of the special duty to the passenger, and it is held that the ordinary rule applicable to acts of agents or servants does not apply. (N. J.) 84.

A somewhat unusual question of the liability for incidental injury to a person by a lawful act toward another person is presented in a case which holds that a passenger on a street car cannot recover for injury caused by the fall of a drunken man upon her when jostled by the conductor in properly removing another drunken man. (Mass.) 832.

In case of an injury to the arm of a lady passenger caused by her attempting, in haste and fright, to escape from a car in which an oil lamp had caught fire, it was held to be a question for the jury whether her conduct was reasonable, and, if it was so, and was caused by mismanagement of the carrier, the carrier was liable. (Mass.) 833.

A passenger who goes out of a car and gets on the lower step when it is slowing down and crossing a street, where he expects to get off, at the speed of about 3 miles an hour, is held not to be guilty of negligence as matter of law. (Ala.) 297.

A passenger riding on a car platform when there are no vacant seats inside is held to be not necessarily guilty of negligence. (Wash.) 300.

A stock owner on a freight train whose contract requires him to care for his stock, but to ride in the caboose, is held not to be negligent in remaining in the stock car if the train starts before he has finished attending to his stock. (Ill.) 210.

Remote cause.

Although the negligence of parents contributing to the death of a minor child is held to be a defense to an action by the personal representative for their benefit as next of kin, yet their negligence in permitting the child to go upon the streets is deemed remote and not proximate, where the child was injured in attempting to cross in front of a street car. (Vt.) 108.

Another of the cases which repudiate any liability of a landowner for injury to trespassers because of defects in the premises holds, with some of the other decisions, that this rule applies to trespassing children. (W. Va.) 148.

Impure water supply.

A water company supplying water so impure as to be dangerous to consumers is held not to be liable on an implied warranty of the purity of the water, but liable for fraud or negligence, if it knowingly supplies such water, causing injury to one who was not guilty of contributory negligence. (Wis.) 117.

Injury by electricity.

An electric company maintaining overhead wires along a public alley is held prima facie liable for injury to persons rightfully in the alley by live ground wires. (Wis.) 505.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; WILLS; LIENS.

See also infra, VIII., as to Lands in Other State.

Corpse.

The disposal of the body of a person who has made no testamentary provision therefor is held to belong to his widow as against a stranger to his blood to whom the court in probate attempts to give authority. (Cal.) 388. 43 L. R. A.

Bailment.

The rights of a bailor of property as against a third person who injures it are held to be unaffected by the negligence of the bailee or his servants contributing to the injury. (N. J.) 849.

Easement.

Electric light wires strung over a private alley to furnish light for one of the owners of the easement therein, without the consent of the others, are held to be an improper obstruction to the alley, although about 14 feet above the ground. (Ill.) 645.

Water rights.

A small stream of water coming through a hole in the bed rock several feet below the surface of the ground but following no well-defined channel is regarded as percolating water which can be appropriated by the owner of the land without liability to the owner of a spring into which some of the water has been accustomed to flow. (Vt.) 105.

A prior appropriator of water by a ditch across lands subsequently patented to another person, without any reservation of his right, is held to have a vested right which is protected, and may enter upon such lands to repair the ditch. (Or.) 130.

Piers in lake.

Piers built out into the waters of a lake to protect land from erosion, but not to aid navigation, and the effect of which is to reclaim the land, are held to be a purpresture which the state may require to be removed. (Ill.) 700.

Cotenancy.

A peculiar case of the holding over of a firm of tenants under a permit from one of them who was a tenant in common of the property holds that this did not have the effect of renewing the lease. (N. Y.) 667.

Pledge.

Although a pledgee cannot without express agreement with the pledgeor purchase the pledged property at his own sale, he is held not to become liable for conversion by the mere fact that he has made such purchase, but such purchase does not change the relations of the parties. (Ohio) 737.

Trademarks.

The original manufacturer of Waltham watches is held entitled to an injunction against the use of the word "Waltham" by another manufacturer of watches at the same place, except in connection with distinguishing words which will prevent deception of the public. (Mass.) 826.

The right of labor unions to a trademark, although they do not own the goods on which the trademark is used, is sustained. (N. J.) 86.

Trust.

Money withheld by a mortgagee in breach of a promise to advance the full amount of a mortgage loan for building purposes is held subject to a constructive trust in favor of persons who have contributed labor or materials to the buildings in reliance upon the mortgagee's representations that the money would be paid over to the mortgagor. (D. C.) 622.

Will.

A condition in a will that a gift to the testator's son shall be only for his life unless he procures a divorce from his wife is held not to be void on the ground of public policy, where an action for divorce was pending at the time. (Ill.) 526.

Mortgage; liens.

A mortgage made by a foreign corporation to nonresidents in another state, to secure an antecedent debt, is held valid in the state where the land lies, although it would not be upheld in the state where it was made, on the ground that it would be deemed an unlawful preference. (Ind.) 820.

The provision in a lease for a lien for rent on personal property afterwards brought on the premises is held ineffectual as against a mortgage on such property. (Neb.) 588.

A statutory lien for harvesting grain is held not to be superior to a chattel mortgage given before the grain was ready to cut. (Cal.) 524.

On redemption from mortgage foreclosure when a portion of the mortgage debt remains unpaid it is held that the lien of the mortgage is not restored. (Ark.) 519.

Vendor's lien.

On a sale of real and personal property for a gross consideration without apportionment of the price it is held that a vendor's lien may be enforced against the real estate for the full amount. (Ky.) 551.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.

Appeal.

The right of appeal is held not to be a common-law right, but subject to legislative restriction, notwithstanding a constitutional provision that all courts shall be open. (S. D.) 287.

Cancellation.

A suit for the cancellation and surrender of a receipt renewing a lapsed life insurance policy obtained by fraud is held to be within the jurisdiction of equity, though the fraud would be a good defense to a pending action on the policy. (Mich.) 566.

Injunction.

A contract by a department store for the exclusive sale of a certain kind of article for a certain period on its premises is held enforceable by injunction. (N. Y.) 854.

The power of a court of equity to grant an injunction against enforcing illegal assessments upon resident members of a foreign insurance company, and determine the true basis of assessment, when assessments are payable at the home office of the company, is denied, on the ground that this would require the control of the internal affairs of the company. (D. C.) 390.

Res judicata.

An attempt to bring a second action for negligence alleging other elements of negligence in respect to the same occurrence, after one decision on the merits, is held improper, and the cause of action for negligence held indivisible. (U. C. App. 1st C.) 195.

Land in other state.

A deed by a committee of a lunatic cannot be authorized by judgment of a court of another state, in which the lunatic and the committee reside. (Va.) 806.

A judgment rendered at the domicile of a decedent making a family allowance to his widow is held not to be binding on his lands in another state whose law does not recognize such an allowance. (Ill.) 403.

A nonresident creditor of a foreign corporation in the hands of a receiver when not a resident of the state in which the receiver is appointed, is held entitled to the same protection that resident creditors have against the receiver's claim to property. (Md.) 222.

Foreign receiver.

The right of a receiver appointed in another state to sue is held to be dependent on the discretion of the court and he is denied the right to sue stockholders for liability created by the law of another state, where that would be injurious to citizens of the state where suit is brought. (Iowa) 695.

Joint debtors.

Suit against one maker of a joint note, which by statute is made joint and several, though followed by judgment and execution, is held not to release the other makers from liability for the amount remaining unpaid. (Tenn.) 161.

Bankruptcy.

A claim on a covenant of warranty is held not to be provable under the former bankrupt act as a "contingent debt" or "contingent liability" until a hostile assertion of the paramount title. (Tenn.) 189.

Recovering money paid city.

The right of a property owner who has been compelled to pay assessments to recover back the money so paid from the city is enforced where the improvement was never completed but was wholly abandoned. (Minn.) 584.

Evidence.

The right to read medical books, although admitted to be standard, as evidence, is denied on the ground that they tend to confuse the jury, and also that their authority is constantly shifting. (Iowa) 533.

The rule as to the necessity of proving a freedom from contributory negligence is enforced in a case in which employees using an old punt in going to their work were drowned, without any evidence as to the cause or manner of the accident. (Me.) 437.

Witnesses.

One who puts a witness on the stand, but does not ask him any material question, is held not to be precluded thereby from cross-examining him and proving his contradictory statements out of court, if he is examined by the other party on matters material to the issues. (N. Y.) 676.

Damages.

A telegraph company is held liable for punitive damages when one agent maliciously sends a libelous message to another for delivery to a third person. (Minn.) 581.

The loss of a reward offered for the capture of a criminal is held to be within the damages recoverable for failure to deliver a telegram, although this did not on its face contain information as to the reward. (Iowa) 214.

The measure of damages for wrongful ejection from a street car is held not to be limited to the price of a ticket for another fare which the passenger had and could have used, where the conductor failed to investigate the facts as he might have done, but ejected the passenger on a false charge of attempting to beat the company. (Wash.) 706.

Damage for pain and suffering are held not to be recoverable in an action for the negligent killing of a passenger in a railroad accident in which many were instantly killed and there is nothing to show that his death was not instantaneous. (Mich.) 568.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

The provision of the Utah Constitution allowing verdicts by eight jurors except in capital cases is sustained against the contention that it violates the provision of the Federal Constitution as to right of trial by jury, or due process of law. (Utah) 33.

Special jury.

A statute providing for a special jury list to be made by a commissioner from the general list is held constitutional. (N. Y.) 247.

Ex post facto law.

A statute limiting the right of a prisoner to deductions for good behavior and permits to be at liberty during such good time is held ex post facto as applied to offenses committed before its passage. (Mass.) 154.

Contempt.

The publication of articles tending to embarrass a court pending a suit, even after the decision of the case and after the time for rehearing has elapsed, but while time still remains to apply for modification of the opinion, is held to constitute a punishable contempt. (Wash.) 717.

The pardoning power of the governor is held to extend to cases of contempt. (Tenn.) 788.

The pardon of a person imprisoned for felony is held to prevent that imprisonment from being considered as one of the two former imprisonments required to make an habitual criminal. (Ohio) 94.

Sale of intoxicants.

A social club in which intoxicating liquors are sold is held to be within the Georgia statute against keeping tippling houses open on the Sabbath day. (Ga.) 395.

Prostitutes.

An ordinance prohibiting prostitutes from going upon the streets or alleys of a city between 7 P. M. and 4 A. M. without reasonable necessity therefor is sustained as a valid exercise of the police power. (Ky.) 701.

Evidence.

A judgment in a divorce suit is held inadmissible in criminal prosecution for the support of the defendant's wife, although the same acts are in issue in both cases. (Conn.) 620.

ABANDONMENT.

See CONTRACTS, 9.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

See INSURANCE, 10.

ACTION OR SUIT.

1. The breach of a mortgagee's promise to advance funds to the mortgagor does not create any liability in equity to creditors of the mortgagor who would have derived benefit from the performance of the promise, unless the mortgagee owed them some obligation or duty. Anglo-American Sav. & L. Asso. v. Campbell (D. C. App.) 622

2. Corruption in the passage of a resolution by a city council may be set up by the city in defense of an action which is based on the resolution. Weston v. Syracuse (N. Y.) 678

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Action; for violation of ordinance. 185
By particeps criminis; based on one's own wrong. 208

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

The mere construction, maintenance, and occasional use by a railroad company of an ordinary railroad track across a platted street while it still remains unimproved and unfit for use, and before public convenience or necessity requires it to be opened and improved for use as a street, does not constitute adverse possession as against the public, but must be presumed to be subject to the paramount right of the public. St. Paul & D. R. Co. v. Duluth (Minn.) 433

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Adverse possession; hostility of. 434

AGENCY.

See PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

AGREED STATEMENT.

An admission in an agreed statement of facts that under the laws of another state a claim has been allowed by its courts against a decedent's estate does not admit that the claim is valid and enforceable under the laws of the state where it is sought to be enforced. L. R. A.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

See also TRIAL, 13.

1. The right to appeal from the rulings of the trial court upon challenges to jurors is entirely within the legislative judgment. People v. Dunn (N. Y.) 247

2. The right to appeal is not a common-law right, but depends upon written law. McClain v. Williams (S. D.) 287

3. Legislative power to limit appeals to a defined class of cases is not restricted by a constitutional provision that all courts shall be open and every man have a remedy by due course of law. Id.

4. The legislature may limit the right to appeal to cases involving at least a specified amount under constitutional provisions that the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction only which shall be coextensive throughout the state, and that appeals shall be allowed under such regulations as may be prescribed by law. Id.

5. The amount involved necessary to authorize an appeal cannot be fixed at different sums in suits in county and circuit courts if in some counties the two courts have concurrent jurisdiction in a large class of cases and the Constitution provides that laws relating to courts shall have general and uniform operation throughout the state and that the practice of all courts of the same class or grade so far as regulated by law shall be uniform. Id.

6. A law limiting the right to appeal to cases involving at least a specified amount will, unless otherwise provided, apply to pending appeals as well as to those subsequently taken. Id.

What reviewable.

7. That a statute providing for licensing 875 public warehousemen provides an efficient remedy for violation of their duty cannot be raised for the first time on appeal in an equity case to enjoin them from using their privileges to suppress competition. Central Elevator Co. v. People, Moloney (Ill.) 658

8. If the trial court sustains the objection of the losing party to remarks by the opposing counsel in argument to the jury, he cannot complain on appeal that they were not ruled out if he did not ask that they should be. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Beebe (Ill.) 210

9. Failure of the superior court to determine the facts correctly cannot be considered in the supreme court of errors. Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (Conn.) 305

10. An erroneous conclusion drawn by the trial court from facts found by it from the evidence offered may be corrected on appeal. Id.

11. A finding of negligence cannot be reviewed for error in law if a separate statement of the facts ascertained and the application of the law thereto is impracticable, so that the case cannot serve as a precedent. Id.

12. A finding that conditions attending two trains moving in the same direction on a single-track road created an emergency for which the rules governing the operation of trains did not provide, requiring the exercise of ordinary prudence in giving special instructions, is a finding of law reviewable by the appellate court. Id.

13. Findings by a trial court that a railroad did not sufficiently provide for the operation of two trains which came into collision; that it was negligent in failing so to provide by special order in addition to the general rules; that an injury resulted from this negligence; and that the railroad did not exercise ordinary care in the movements of trains,—although called findings of fact—are reviewable by the appellate court as conclusions of law. Id.

Grounds of reversal.

14. Excluding evidence of a fact which is otherwise indisputably proved is not material error. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Campbell (Tex.) 225

15. Excluding answers to pertinent questions is not ground for reversal, unless the record affirmatively shows that the answers would have been competent and material. Weeks v. McNulty (Tenn.) 185

16. The abandonment of common counts makes the failure to elect between them and others immaterial. Carland v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Mich.) 280

17. Refusal to allow a pleading to be amended during trial will not be ground for reversal, where no abuse of discretion or necessity to amend is shown. York v. Steward (Mont.) 125

18. Refusal to take the case from the jury is not error if there is evidence tending to support the cause of action set up in the declaration. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Beebe (Ill.) 210

an action on a life insurance policy the right to open and close is not ground for reversal, where defendant was not thereby prejudiced in any manner. Sailer v. Economic L. Asso. (Ia.) 537

20. An instruction on a life insurance policy that fraud is not to be presumed, but like any other fact may be proved by circumstances from which the inference of fraud is natural and "irresistible" is not ground for reversal because of the use of the word "irresistible" where it is so qualified by the instruction given immediately thereafter that its use could not have prejudiced appellant. Id.

ASSAULT.

See also CARRIERS, 5.

A druggist who drops croton oil on candy for a customer in quantity sufficient to produce serious injury if taken into a person's system, knowing or reasonably believing that it is intended for a practical joke on someone, and not for medicinal purposes, will be guilty of assault upon one injured by its administration by way of joke. State v. Monroe (N. C.) 861

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Assault; without intending injury; by administering drug. 861

ASSESSMENTS.

See ASSUMPSIT, 2; INSURANCE, 4, 5, 11, 12; PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

ASSOCIATIONS.

See CONSPIRACY; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 13; DAMAGES, 1.

ASSUMPSIT.

1. An action for breach of the contract of a telegraph company may be brought in assumpsit, and need not be ex delicto. Carland v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Mich.) 280

2. One who is compelled by judicial proceedings to pay assessments for a street improvement which is never completed, but is wholly abandoned by the city, is entitled to recover from the city the amount so paid by him, as upon a failure of consideration. McConville v. St. Paul (Minn.) 584

ATTACHMENT.

A claim filed with a receiver of a corporation by a nonresident creditor, with an express reservation or condition that by filing it he does not intend to abandon any rights gained by reason of an attachment suit previously brought in another state, does not estop the creditor from pursuing the attachment. Linville v. Hadden (Md.) 222

BAGGAGE.

See CARRIERS, 21, 22.

BAIL AND RECOGNIZANCE.

See NEGLIGENCE, 3.

BAILMENT.

See also MASTER AND SERVANT, 11.

1. A bailment of hire is terminated when the property is no longer fit and suitable for and cannot be devoted to the use for which it was hired, so as to give the bailor the right to maintain an action for injury done to the property. New Jersey Elec. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (N. J. Sup.) 849

2. A bailor can maintain an action against a third party for injury done to a chattel during the continuance of the bailment, whether an action might or might not be maintained against such third party by the bailee for trover, trespass, or replevin to control the immediate possession. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Bailment; right of action for injury to property by third person. 853

BANKRUPTCY.

There is no liability on a covenant of warranty which was provable as a "contingent debt" or "contingent liability" under the bankrupt act of 1867 (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5068), until there was a hostile assertion of the paramount title. Wight v. Gottschalk (Tenn.) 189

BANKS.

1. A private bank is not a "regularly organized bank," within the meaning of Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 228, § 9, authorizing the deposit of municipal funds in regularly organized banks. Du Quoin v. Kelly (Ill.) 644

2. City funds received on deposit by a banker, but redeposited by him in other banks under an arrangement for sharing in the deposits, under which he receives from them the same interest that he pays the city, and agrees that they shall be drawn only to pay city orders, are held in trust for the city as against his assignee for creditors. Marquette v. Wilkinson (Mich.) 840

1. The negotiability of a note is not destroyed by a clause stating that it is given for certain property the title to which shall not pass until the note is paid, and which is subject to be retaken in case of nonpayment of the note. Ohoate v. Stevens (Mich.) 277

2. A promissory note, and a contemporaneous written agreement referring thereto and providing that the maker may receive back the note on surrendering certain stock, constitute an entire contract the stipulations of which are mutual and dependent, rather than independent and collateral. American Gas & V. M. Co. v. Wood (Me.) 449

3. The drawee of a draft cannot be compelled to make payment to one who holds under a spurious indorsement, although the draft was taken in good faith in due course of business. Beattie v. National Bank of Illinois (Ill.) 654

4. Title to a bill of exchange is not transferred by indorsement of one bearing the name of the payee, but who was in fact a stranger to the bill and who acquired possession of it by mistake. Id.

5. Presentment and demand of payment made on a receiver pendente lite of an insolvent bank and notice of nonpayment by him are sufficient to bind an indorser of a negotiable certificate of deposit issued by the bank before its insolvency. Jackson v. McInnis (Or.) 128

6. The other makers of a joint note which by statute is made joint and several remain liable for the amount unpaid on it including the sum not realized by a suit against one maker for his proportionate share, although that proceeded to judgment and execution against his property. Sully v. Campbell (Tenn.) 161

BOUNDARIES.

The owner of premises bounded on Lake Michigan takes no title to any submerged land under the waters of the lake. Revell v. People (Ill.) 790

BOYCOTT.

See CONSPIRACY, 1.

BROKERS.

See also EVIDENCE, 11.

A person employing brokers to sell land is not liable to them for commissions, where he was acting for an undisclosed principal, and his agency was disclosed after the brokers had brought persons to accept an option merely, but before a binding agreement was made. Brackenridge v. Claridge (Tex.) 593

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Brokers; real-estate broker's commissions as affected by the negligence, fraud, or default of the principal, and a defective title:—(I.) Default of principal in entering into or carrying out contract with purchaser: (a) in general; (b) refusal to enter into written contract or to make the sale; (c) refusing to accept purchaser found; (d) where the contract is oral, (e) when a binding contract exists; (f) principal's refusal to enforce contract, and release of purchaser; (g) refusing to execute deed or conveyance; (h) refusal of other parties to convey; (i) inability of principal to complete sale; (j) negligence of principal; (k) refusing to accept purchase money; (l) purchaser's pecuniary responsibility; (m) necessity of tender of performance by purchaser; (n) effect of stipulations in broker's contract; (o) principal's acts justified; (p) actions relating to and damages therefor; (II.) default in carrying out contract with broker: (a) principal's interference with broker; (b) wrongful termination of agency; (III.) defective title: (a) general doctrine; (b) the question of notice; (IV.) misrepresentation and fraud of principal. 593

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS.

See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 9.

1. The right of a building, loan, and investment society to execute negotiable paper is implied in the power to incur debts for various purposes and to sell and mortgage property. Grommes v. Sullivan (C. C. App. 7th C.) 419

2. The acceptance of a negotiable order by a building, loan, and investment society which has power to execute negotiable paper under some circumstances is binding on the corporation in favor of a bona fide holder, although nothing was due to the drawer of the order when it was accepted. Id.

3. The necessary expenses of perfecting a loan may be taken out of the money loaned to a member by a loan association. Iowa Sav. & L. Asso. v. Heidt (Iowa) 689

4. The exaction of an arbitrary sum in addition to interest from a borrower, when there is no competition, is not authorized by Iowa Code 1873, tit. 9, chap. 6, allowing premiums bid for the right of precedence in taking loans. Id.

5. A deduction of a specified part of the dues paid to a loan association for necessary expenses of management is lawful. Id. 43 L. R. A.

6. A fine of 5 cents for the first default on each share, and 10 cents for each subsequent default by a member of a loan association, is not exorbitant. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Building and loan associations; power of building association to issue negotiable paper. 419

Ultra vires acts of. 422

Validity of premium; validity of contract of. 689

BUILDINGS.

1. Failure to construct fire escapes on a hotel as required by an ordinance does not make the proprietor liable for the death of a guest by fire, unless that was caused by the lack of the fire escapes. Weeks v. McNulty (Tenn.) 185

2. Want of fire escapes is not shown to be the cause of the death of a guest in a hotel by fire, where it is not shown that he was at a window or in any position where a fire escape would have afforded him any benefit, but there is evidence that he had locked himself in his room and tried to break the door to make his escape, and also that he could have safely escaped by leaping from the window to the roof of an adjoining building. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Buildings; liability for failure to provide fire escapes. 185

1. The failure of a railroad company to furnish accommodations for its passengers on a train, so that a large number of them are compelled to stand in the aisles and upon the platforms of the cars, constitutes negligence. Graham v. McNeill (Wash.) 300

2. Failure of a railroad company to have a good, substantial, and safe track for its trains, or to see that its trains are properly managed, will render it liable for an injury to a passenger therefrom. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Beebe (Ill.) 210

3. A passenger lawfully on a freight train, who in the exercise of due care arises when the train comes to a standstill either to leave the train or to feed stock which his contract requires him to do, may recover from the carrier for injuries caused by a sudden start or unusual jerking of the train. Id.

4. The conductor of a train on which a passenger has been carried past destination has no implied authority to constitute the proprietor of a hotel an agent of the carrier for the purpose of caring for such passenger until a return train comes, so as to render the company liable for injuries to the passenger in consequence of the hotelkeeper's negligence. Central of Ga. R. Co. v. Price, (Ga.) 402

Assault on passenger.

5. A common carrier is liable for a malicious assault made by its employee upon a passenger. Haver v. Central R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 84

6. A passenger on whom a drunken man is thrown by being jostled while the conductor is removing another drunken man from the car rightfully and without negligence has no right of action therefor against the carrier. Spade v. Lynn & B. R. Co. (Mass.) 832.

Fright of passenger.

7. A street-car conductor's knowledge of the peculiar sensitiveness of a lady passenger does not increase the carrier's obligation toward her, although in case of a wrong toward her the carrier will be liable for the actual consequences, even if the effect would have been less upon a normal person. Id.

8. The impulsive and ungaurded act of a lady passenger, by which she is hurt, while trying to escape from a car because of a reasonable fear due to mismanagement of the carrier, is to be deemed a consequence of such mismanagement, for which the carrier is responsible. Gannon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (Mass.) 833

Passenger's fault or negligence.

9. Mere standing place on the inside of a car is not ordinarily such proper accommodation for a passenger as will make it negligence for him to stand on the car platform. Graham v. McNeill (Wash.) 300

10. The rule of a railroad company that passengers must not stand on platforms is waived by receiving passengers for whom it fails to provide suitable accommodations inside its coaches. Id.

11. A passenger is not guilty of negligence in standing on the platform of a car when there are no vacant seats in the car and the platform is the most comfortable and convenient place for him to occupy on the trip. Id.

12. A passenger who gets on the step of a car for the purpose of alighting, when the car is slowing down at a stopping place, is not riding on the platform, within the meaning of the carrier's regulations, but is merely using it as a means of egress. Watkins v. Birmingham R. & E. Co. (Ala.) 297

13. A passenger who leaves his seat in a car on a dummy railroad and goes down on the lower step of the back platform as the train slows up for a street crossing at which he is to stop, and while it is passing over the street at a speed of about three miles an hour, is not guilty of negligence, as matter of law, which will preclude his recovering for injuries caused by the sudden increase of speed, which throws him to the ground. Id. 43 L. R. A.

14. A shipper traveling on a freight car with the consent of the carrier, to care for his stock, is regarded as a paying passenger. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Beebe (Ill.) 210

15. A stockowner on a freight train, under a contract to care for his stock, but to ride in the caboose, will not be negligent in remaining in the stock car if before he has finished attending to the stock the train starts and proceeds upon its journey. Id.

Ejection.

16. One who gets upon a train with a ticket which he knows does not upon its face entitle him to passage because the time for which it purports to be valid has expired, although he thinks the limitation unreasonable, cannot recover damages for being ejected, if he refuses to pay fare. Trezona v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (Ia.) 136

Tickets.

17. The holder of a railroad ticket who does not use it for a passage during its life for such a purpose is not entitled, as matter of law, to have the purchase price refunded. Id.

18. The mere stamping or printing of a limitation upon a railroad ticket, and the acceptance of such ticket by a passenger, are not sufficient to bind him to such limitation in the absence of actual notice of it, and his assent thereto when he purchases the ticket. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Turner (Tenn.) 149

19. Posting notices of intention to limit the time for passage on railroad tickets in the waiting rooms, ticket offices, and on the cars, will not affect passengers with notice so that they will be bound by limitation by taking the ticket without agreeing to the limitation. Id.

20. To limit a general ticket for passage on a railroad, for which full price is paid, to the date on which it is sold, there must be an express contract based upon a consideration, or the alternative must be given the purchaser to have a full and unlimited ticket. Id.

Baggage or property of passenger.

21. The baggage which a passenger is entitled to take at common law includes, not only wearing apparel, but other articles, within reasonable limit, for personal use during his journey and in accomplishing its purposes. Runyan v. Central R. Co. of N. J. (N. J. Err. & App.) 284

22. The common-law right of a passenger to carry personal baggage with him is not restricted by a clause on his ticket stating: "Free transportation allowed for 150 lbs. baggage (wearing apparel) only, and company's liability expressly limited to $1 per lb." Id.

23. Small packages of merchandise, the use of which is not personal to the passenger in accomplishing the purpose of his journey, cannot be taken in a passenger car as part of the baggage which he is allowed to take at common law. Id.

24. Long acquiescence by a common carrier in the carriage of small packages of merchandise by its passengers, and its provision therefor in passenger cars, will establish a regulation which cannot be rescinded without reasonable notice. Id.

Limiting liability.

25. A carrier cannot contract for relief from liability for injuries to a passenger paying fare, caused by its own negligence. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Beebe (Ill.) 210

Duty to furnish cars.

26. The duty of a railroad company to furnish cars for transportation to a person making a timely demand therefor is imposed by Tex. Rev. Stat. 1895, arts. 4494, 4495, without the necessity of a contract for the cars. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Campbell (Tex.) 225

27. The proviso in Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 4498, that the place designated in an application for cars "shall be at some station or switch on the railroad," was not intended to require cars to be furnished at such switches as were not otherwise within the terms of the statute. Id.

28. A penalty for failure to furnish cars to a shipper under Tex. Rev. Stat. arts. 4497-4502, cannot be imposed for failure to furnish cars at a switch where the carrier has no agent, as "the agent" to whom, under art. 4500, a deposit must be made of one fourth the freight charge for the car, means the agent at or for the station where the cars are desired. Id.

29. A carrier's knowledge of a shipper's contract is not necessary in order to make it liable for failing to furnish cars when demanded, in order to make shipments to fill the contract. Id.

30. A notification to a railroad company by a person to whom shipments were being made under a contract, not to receive any more such shipments, will not relieve the carrier for failure to furnish cars to the shipper when demanded. Id.

31. Failure of a railroad company to furnish cars to a shipper who has property ready to ship under a contract, and demands cars, will render the carrier liable for his damages on account of the failure, although he does not continue to prepare and offer for shipment the remainder of the property required to fill the contract. Id.

Rates.

32. A mistake in a bill of lading, by stating interstate rates less than those scheduled in accordance with the act of Congress, does not preclude the carrier from recovering the full schedule rate as a condition of delivering the goods. Southern R. Co. v. Harrison (Ala.) 385

33. The omission from Ky. Stat. § 820, of the proviso found in Ky. Const. § 218, that the railroad commission may authorize a less charge for longer than for shorter distances, on application by the carrier, does not make the statute inconsistent with the Constitution, as the proviso is self-executing and the statute expressly provides that the commission may exonerate a carrier from its provisions even without previous application. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 541

34. Competition in transportation does not prevent "substantially similar circumstances and conditions," within the meaning of Ky. Const. § 218, and Ky. Stat. § 820, but those words relate to the actual cost of transportation. Id.

CASES CERTIFIED.

A judge has sat in a case so as to be entitled to dissent from the decision and cause the case to be certified to another court on the ground of a conflict of decisions, notwithstanding the fact that he has not had any consultation with the other judges on the merits of the case, where he was on the bench when the case was argued and submitted, and afterwards agreed with the other judges that the decision should be withheld for a time, and on learning of a decision rendered by them in his absence promptly sent to the judge who wrote the opinion a memorandum stating that it was in conflict with another decision, and that a motion for rehearing ought therefore to be granted, in addition to which he filed a dissenting opinion pending the motion for rehearing, and was on the bench, but not consulted, when his associates overruled that motion in accordance with an agreement they had previously made and of which they had notified him. State, Hazel, v. Bland (Mo.) 845

1. Judicial powers are not delegated to a special jury commissioner by providing that he shall eliminate from the jury list persons declared by law to be unfit or disqualified to sit in criminal cases, and thus prepare a list from which a panel of fit and impartial jurors may be chosen. People v. Dunn (N. Y.) 247

2. A curative act which merely takes away the privilege of pleading usury does not change the agreement, but only removes a bar to its enforcement, and is not an unconstitutional impairment of a vested right. Iowa Sav. & L. Asso. v. Heidt (Iowa) 689

Ex post facto laws.

3. An ex post facto law is one which will increase the penalty or deprive a party of substantial rights or privileges to which he was entitled as the law stood when the offense was committed. Murphy v. Com. (Mass.) 154

4. A statute requiring the approval of the governor and council to a permit for the release of a convict after the expiration of the minimum term of his sentence is not an ex post facto law, but relates merely to a matter of procedure. Id.

5. The duration of a sentence is not uncertain, and the determination of the term of imprisonment is not taken from the courts, so as to make the act ex post facto as applied to an offense previously committed, merely because it provides for a sentence that is indeterminate between a maximum and minimum, and gives the prison commissioners, after the minimum term, power to release the prisoner on a permit approved by the governor and council. Id.

6. A statute which alters or may alter in a substantial manner the positions of those committing offenses prior to its passage is unconstitutional as to such an offense, even if it is possible that in that particular case it might operate more beneficially than the prior law would have operated. Id.

7. Deductions for good conduct and permits to be at liberty, to which prisoners who were convicted of offenses committed when Mass. Stat. 1880, chap. 218, and Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 222, § 20, were in force, are entitled as of right rather than by favor, for faithful observance of the rules and for not having been subjected to punishment, constitute rights which cannot be taken away or interfered with to their disadvantage by subsequent legislation. Id.

8. The provision of Utah Const. art. 1, § 10, that in courts of general jurisdiction except in capital cases a jury shall consist of eight jurors, applies to a prosecution for an offense committed before the adoption of the Constitution, as it affects the procedure merely, and in that view is not ex post facto when applied to past offenses. State v. Bates (Utah) 33

Equality.

9. Statutes exempting building and loan associations from the operation of the usury law are not unconstitutional as class legislation. Iowa Sav. & L. Assn. v. Heidt (Iowa) 689

10. The exclusion of residents of the state who are not taxpayers, but who are willing to pay the license tax, from fishing in the public waters of the state as taxpayers are allowed to do is in violation of Tex. Const. art. 1, § 3, which guarantees equal rights, and prohibits exclusive separate public emoluments or privileges, except in consideration of public services. Gustafson v. State (Tex.) 615

11. It is not an unconstitutional discrimination against persons who are to be tried in a criminal branch of the court to require them to be tried by jurors taken from the body of the county whose general qualifications have been more particularly ascertained by a special jury commissioner, but who are still subject to judicial inquiry as to their qualifications and impartiality as in the case of an ordinary panel. People v. Dunn (N. Y.) 247

12. Jury trials by a jury of less than twelve under state laws in a state court does not violate U. S. Const. 14th Amend. § 1, making all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside, and declaring that no state shall make or enforce any law abridging the privileges or immunities of the citizens in the United States. State v. Bates (Utah) 33

13. A statute providing for labels and trademarks of associations or unions of working men does not violate a constitutional provision against special laws granting exclusive privileges, although it gives to the associations or unions privileges denied to single individuals. Schmalz v. Woolley (N. J. Err. & App.) 80

Due process of law.

14. What was due process of law before the adoption of the Federal Constitution continues such. State v. Sponaugle (W. Va.) 727

15. Due process of law is not denied by requiring the jury in a criminal case to be composed of persons taken from the body selected by a special commissioner of jurors from the general list. People v. Dunn (N. Y.) 247

16. Due process of law within U. S. Const. 14th Amend. § 1, declaring that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, is not denied by Utah Const. art. 1, § 10, providing that in courts of general jurisdiction, except in capital cases, a jury shall consist of eight jurors. State v. Bates (Utah) 33

17. "Due process of law" guaranteed by Utah Const. art. 1, § 7, is not infringed by § 10 of the same article declaring that in courts of general jurisdiction, except in capital cases, a jury shall consist of eight jurors. Id.

18. A judicial hearing is not necessary to due process of law in matters of taxation. State v. Sponaugle (W. Va.) 727

19. The forfeiture of land under W. Va. Const. art. 13, § 6, for the failure of the owner to enter it for taxation during five successive years, does not violate the provision as to due process of law in the Federal Constitution, as such forfeitures were a part of the law of the land before the provision of the Federal Constitution was adopted. Id.

20. To compel persons to accept the decision of a statutory umpire as to the weight of grain, and preclude them from showing error in his weight, whether it is the result of bad faith or not, would be a deprivation of property without due process of law. Vega S. S. Co. v. Consolidated Elevator Co. (Minn.) 843

21. An absolute right of a corporation to use the street-railway tracks of another corporation cannot be burdened by a subsequent statute so as to make the exercise of the right depend on the consent of abutting owners. Ingersoll v. Nassau Elec. R. Co. (N. Y.) 236

Police powers.

22. An ordinance prohibiting any prostitute from being on the streets or alleys of a city between the hours of 7 o'clock P. M. and 4 o'clock A. M., without any reasonable necessity therefor, is a valid exercise of the police power under a statute giving authority to "restrain and punish prostitutes." Dunn v. Com. (Ky.) 701

23. Forbidding all but duly appointed agents of transportation companies from engaging in the business of ticket broker is a violation of the liberty guaranteed to citizens by the Constitution, which is not justified by the police power of the state. People, Tyroler, v. Warden of New York City Prison (N. Y.) 264

24. The owner of land over which a brook flows is not deprived of property without compensation by Vt. Stat. § 4568, allowing fish and game commissioners to place fish in the stream to prohibit fishing therein for not more than three years, and by other provisions that make the waters public for at least five years longer, but such provisions are justified by Vt. Const. chap. 1, art. 5, as a regulation of the internal police, and chap. 2, § 40, giving the inhabitants of the state the right to fish "in all boatable and other waters (not private property) under proper regulations, to be hereafter made and provided by the general assembly." *State v. 1. The extension of the time for payment of a mortgage, made by a written agreement which is not based on any new consideration, is invalid. Olmstead v. Latimer (N. Y.) 685

2. An instrument written and signed by one person for another, in his presence and by his direction, is sufficient to bind him, under the statute of frauds, without any written authority to sign for him. Morton v. Murray (Ill.) 529

3. An oral agreement to give property by will to children who become members of the household of the promisor and give him their services, and also sell real estate at a sacrifice and pay over the proceeds to him, in consideration of his promise, is taken out of the statute of frauds by the fact that the value of their society and services cannot be measured in money, and they cannot be restored to the former position with respect to their property. *Svanburg v. 7. The mere expression of dissatisfaction:

with an article furnished under a contract providing that it shall be satisfactory will not justify a termination of the contract, if there was not an actual dissatisfaction. Worthington v. Givin (Ala.) 382

8. A promise to pay an acknowledged indebtedness at such times and in such sums as the debtor "might feel able to pay" creates a legal and moral obligation to pay when the debtor is able, and, although the debtor is made the judge of that fact, his judgment must be honestly exercised. *Pistel v. 2. A purchase of the plant, machinery, stock, and such visible property of a manufacturing corporation, although it carries the right to use the name of the articles manufactured, does not give the purchaser the right to take the name of the corporation. Id.

3. A vote of a corporation which is purely voluntary and without consideration, to give the use of the corporate name to a new corporation which has previously purchased the plant of the former, is ineffectual as against a minority who do not consent. Id.

4. A corporation which still has assets consisting of accounts and bills and notes receivable, which were excepted from a sale of the remainder of the corporate property, can, without showing actual damage, restrain the use of its name by another corporation which has purchased the plant and is continuing the business of the former. Id.

5. A corporation is liable in damages to anyone purchasing for value, without notice, spurious stock issued by reason of its neglect to observe care in the issue of the certificates of stock and supervise its agent charged with the performance of such duty. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank (Ohio) 777

6. That a certificate of stock is issued in favor of the secretary of the corporation is not sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry as to whether he is rightfully the owner, where no other mode of issuing stock than by the president or the secretary under the corporate seal is provided, and neither the secretary nor the president is prohibited from holding stock. Williams* (S. D.) 287

3. The circuit court of one county having jurisdiction of the parties and the original controversy has jurisdiction to decree a sale of land in another county as incidental to the relief originally sought. Doty v. Deposit Bldg. & L. Asso. (Ky.) 551

4. A suit to enjoin a foreign insurance company to which all assessments are payable at its home office, but which has an agency and carries on business within the jurisdiction of the court, against collecting from a resident therein any excessive and illegal assessments, and against forfeiting his policy for nonpayment of such assessments, while seeking also an accounting and a discovery of the books and papers of the corporation, and a determination of the true basis of assessments, is beyond the power or jurisdiction of a court of equity, as the relief sought would require the control, direction, and revision of the internal affairs of the corporation. Clark v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Asso. (D. C. App.) 390

5. The court cannot interfere with the refusal of the railroad commission, under Ky. Const. § 218, to allow a less charge for a longer than for a shorter haul, as it is permitted to do in special cases by that section. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 541

6. A resolution by which a common council undertakes to make a compromise with 42 L. R. A.

by-law which imposed a penalty for its violation. Boutwell v. Marr (Vt.) 803

2. Punitive damages are recoverable against a telegraph company for the malicious transmission of a libelous message over its wires by its agent within the scope of his employment. Peterson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Minn.) 581

3. The expenditure for rails for a side track to be used in mining may be included in the damages for breach of a mining contract. Worthington v. Gwin (Ala.) 382

4. A stipulation that the damages for breach of contract in quitting the service of a contractor for loading and unloading vessels and cars upon docks shall be the loss of fifteen days' wages is justified by the uncertainty as to the injury that may be caused thereby to the employer's business. Fisher v. Walsh (Wis.) 810

5. The enhancement, because of fright, of the damages sustained by a passenger on whom a drunken man is thrown in a car while another drunken man is being removed from the car, must be limited to the fright caused by the personal contact with the former, and cannot extend to the fright resulting from the general disturbance. Spade v. Lynn & B. R. Co. (Mass.) 832

6. Three hundred dollars damages is excessive for putting a passenger off a train for attempting to ride after the time limited on the ticket has expired, although the limitation was unlawful, if no force was used, or purpose to humiliate was shown, and the passenger was within a few miles of his destination, which he reached without further outlay only five hours later than he would had the train carried him. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Turner (Tenn.) 140

7. The measure of damages for wrongful ejection from a street car is not limited to the price of a ticket for another fare which plaintiff had in his possession and might have used, where the conductor, instead of ascertaining definitely whether or not plaintiff had paid his fare, which might have been done by a few moments' investigation, charged him with attempting to beat the company, and thus placed him in a position where the use of another ticket would be an apparent admission of the charge. Sprengrer v. Tacoma Traction Co. (Wash.) 706

8. Damages for pain and suffering cannot be allowed in an action for the negligent killing of a passenger in a railroad accident where the force of the collision was such that many passengers were instantly killed and there is nothing to show that the death for which the action was brought was not instantaneous or that deceased was conscious after the shock. Sweetland v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (Mich.) 568

9. The damages for failure to furnish cars to ship property in fulfillment of a contract are the profits which the shipper would have made on the contract if the cars had been furnished. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Campbell (Tex.) 225

transmission of a telegram by one agent or employee of the telegraph company to another is excessive, where the plaintiff himself was the only person to whom the contents of the message were divulged by the agent who received it. Peterson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Minn.) 581

11. The sendee's damages for failure to properly deliver a telegram are limited to what might reasonably have been in contemplation of the parties, but will include compensation for all injurious results which flow therefrom by ordinary natural sequence without the interposition of any other negligent act or overpowering force. McPeck v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Iowa) 214

12. Damages for failure to promptly deliver a telegram advising the sendee of the whereabouts of a fugitive from justice may include loss of a reward offered for the capture, although the message did not contain such information on its face, if the company knew that it was important and that the sendee was expecting a message relating to such capture, and although neither the company nor the sendee knew at the time of the offer of reward, since the company was charged with knowledge that the reward might be made and that negligence might result in its loss. 1. The doctrine of prescription is not applicable to percolating water. Wheelock v. Jacobs (Vt.) 105

2. A prior appropriator who owns a ditch across lands subsequently patented by the state to another person has the right to enter on such lands to clean and repair the ditch. Carson v. Gentner (Or.) 130

3. The fact that electric-light wires are about 14 feet above the surface of a private alley over which they are strung without right will not prevent the court from ordering their removal,—especially when they might interfere with the operations of the fire department, and obstruct the transfer of freight or other materials to and from the second-story windows of a building. Car-penter v. Capital Electric Co. (Ill.) 645

4. Electric-light wires and the cross arm attached to a pole which stands outside of an alley cannot be lawfully extended over a private alley the easement of which is confined to abutting owners, although it is done to furnish electric light to one of the parties entitled to the easement, but without the consent of the others. Id.

EMINENT DOMAIN.

1. The constitutional provision against 43 L. R. A.

taking private property for public use without just compensation applies to money as well as other property, and prevents a municipal tax on property or business so situated that it can receive no protection or benefit from the municipality. Kaysville v. Ellison (Utah) 81

2. A change of a county road to a city street in consequence of the incorporation of the city does not impose an additional servitude upon the real property over which the highway is constructed, so as to require any new condemnation. Huddleston v. Eugene (Or.) 444

3. An electric motor street railway built upon street grade, doing no special injury to the fee, is not an imposition of a new or additional servitude upon the highway for which the owner of the fee is entitled to compensation,—especially when the law at the time when the street was made authorized the use of electricity by street railways. Birmingham Traction Co. v. Birmingham Ry. & Elec. Co. (Ala.) 233

4. Laying an electric street-car track on a turnpike within about 7 feet of a building does not entitle the abutting owner to compensation, although it prevents teams from standing in front of his place of business as they have formerly been able to do. Ashland & C. Street R. Co. v. Faulkner (Ky.) 554

5. Poles for electric-light wires are not additional burdens upon the fee of a country highway in a town which has granted the right to maintain the wires and contracted for lighting the streets with the electric lights, as light may be necessary for the safe use of the streets. Palmer v. Larchmont Elec. Co. (N. Y.) 672

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Eminent domain; injury to abutting owner by laying street railway near side of street:—(I.) General principles; (II.) effect of title to bed of street; (III.) extent of right to compensation; (IV.) damages; (V.) the California statute. 554

EQUITY.

See also ACTION OR SUIT, 1; INJUNCTION.

1. The aid of equity to enforce a claim against a decedent's estate cannot be sought until the claim has been established at law. Smith v. Smith (Ill.) 403

2. Equity has jurisdiction of a suit to obtain the cancelation and surrender of a receipt renewing a lapsed life insurance policy, which was obtained by fraud, although the fraud would be a good defense to the pending action at law on the policy. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Dick (Mich.) 556

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Equity; jurisdiction as to cancelation of instrument.	566
Adequate remedy at law.	855

ESTOPPEL.

1. An estoppel in pais arises whenever an act is done or a statement made by a party, the truth or efficacy of which it would be a fraud on his part to controvert or impair. American Gas & V. M. Co. v. Wood (Me.) 449

2. The acceptance of the decree in a divorce suit by a defendant over whom no jurisdiction was obtained, and his remarrying, do not estop him from disputing the validity of a subsequent ex parte proceeding in the divorce suit, by which the judgment is opened and a decree for alimony entered against him. Hekking v. Pfaff (C. C. App. 1st C.) 618

3. Heirs who appear in the courts of the state of their ancestor's late domicile to contest the making of a family allowance to his widow are not estopped by a judgment making the allowance from contesting its payment out of land which descended to them in another state, since the judgment is not against them personally. Smith v. Smith (Ill.) 403

4. An estoppel against claiming that the maker of a note has lost his right to receive it back on the surrender of certain stock by failure to exercise it within the time stipulated arises when his failure was induced by the acts and declarations of the other party assuring him that his right would not be waived by the delay. American Gas & V. M. Co. v. Wood (Me.) 449

5. Representations may constitute an estoppel, although not made to any particular person, if made to all persons likely to come into contractual relations with another, and relied upon by one of them in good faith. Anglo-American Sav. & L. Asso. v. Campbell (D. C. App.) 622

6. A waiver, to be effective, must be made with full knowledge of the rights one intends to waive. Hotchkiss v. Middlekauf (Va.) 806

EVICTION.

See COVENANT.

EVIDENCE.

See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 20; WEIGHTS; WITNESSES.

Presumption and burden of proof.

1. No presumption can be indulged in favor of the jurisdiction of the court in authorizing the mortgage of an infant's property, as the jurisdiction for that purpose is special and limited and wholly dependent upon the statute. Warren v. Union Bank (N. Y.) 256

2. A husband who lives and cohabits with his wife, having children by her, is presumed to have an affection for her, which presumption will continue until overthrown by a fair preponderance of evidence to the contrary. Beach v. Brown (Wash.) 114

3. Opinion evidence based upon disputed evidentiary facts not a subject of scientific investigation, is not admissible except in response to properly framed hypothetical questions. Green v. Ashland Water Co. (Wis.) 117

4. To recover for suffering of a person killed by negligence plaintiff has the burden of showing that conscious suffering on the part of deceased existed. Sweetland v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (Mich.) 568

5. A person is presumed to have knowledge of the impurity of a water supply, when for several years it has been notorious and a matter of common knowledge that the supply is contaminated with sewage, causing epidemics of typhoid fever annually. Green v. Ashland Water Co. (Wis.) 117

6. The bursting of a water main under ordinary pressure after it has previously twice burst under such pressure is sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the question of negligence of the city officials in respect to such pipe. Eseberg-Gunst Cigar Co. v. Portland (Or.) 435

7. Freedom from contributory negligence must affirmatively appear in evidence, or, at least, by some legitimate inference from the evidence, and is not to be presumed. McLane v. Perkins (Me.) 487

8. Failure to prove freedom from contributory negligence precludes recovery for the drowning of an employee who, with others, was going to their work in an old punt, with a crack in one side calked with waste, and a part of one end split off, when all were drowned and there is no evidence as to the cause or manner of the accident. Id.

9. An electric company maintaining overhead wires along a public alley is prima facie liable for injuries caused to persons rightfully in the alley by live grounded wires. Gannon v. Laclede Gas Light Co. (Mo.) 505

10. An allegation in a suit for damages for injuries caused by a live grounded electric wire in a public alley, that its owner permitted it to become broken and to remain down a long time when it knew or ought to have known its condition, does not shift the burden of proof as to care of the wire from defendant to plaintiff. Id.

11. A broker claiming commissions on a sale to a person who declines to take the property because of defective title has the burden of proving the actual existence of the defect. Brackenridge v. Claridge (Tex.) 593

12. The failure of a party to offer himself as a witness does not justify any prejudicial inferences against him, unless it is shown that there were facts peculiarly within his knowledge which were not known so fully to any other witness. Weeks v. McNulty (Tenn.) 165

Documentary.

13. The admission in evidence of newspaper publications and proceedings of public bodies, consisting, in the main, of declarations and statements irrelevant to the issue, and manifestly tending to inflame the minds of the jury, is prejudicial error, though containing some evidence which, standing alone, might be proper. Green v. Ashland Water Co. (Wis.) 117

14. Letters written by a husband to his wife during coverture are admissible to prove his affection for her in an action by her against a third person for alienation of his affections from her. Beach v. Brown (Wash.) 114

15. The record and judgment of dismissal in a divorce proceeding for adultery is not admissible in a subsequent criminal prosecution for nonsupport of wife in defense of which the same acts of adultery are sought to be set up. State v. Bradneck (Conn.) 620

16. Medical books, although admitted to be standard, cannot be read to the jury for the purpose of proving the symptoms of diseases, where they have not been referred to by the witnesses whom they are offered to contradict. Bixby v. Omaha & C. B. R. & B. Co. (Ia.) 533

17. Medical works are not admissible under Iowa Code, § 4618, making historical works and books of science or art presumptive evidence of facts of general notoriety or interest therein stated. Id.

18. A certified copy of a proclamation of the governor which has been deposited in the office of the secretary of state is admissible in evidence under statutes permitting such proof of records in his office where the statutes require him to keep papers deposited to be kept in his office, although no express provision is made as to proclamations. McPeck v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Iowa) 214

Oral, as to writings.

19. Oral warranties made contemporaneously with a written lease cannot be proved where presumptively the parties have reduced their entire contract to writing. York v. Steward (Mont.) 125

20. Evidence of declarations of a husband as to his purpose in writing letters to his wife during coverture is not admissible to contradict expressions of affection contained in them. Beach v. Brown (Wash.) 114

21. Parol evidence is admissible to show that an instrument purporting to be signed by one person for another was written and signed by the latter's direction, in his presence. Morton v. Murray (Ill.) 529

22. Parol testimony is competent in the construction of wills to prove the circumstances of the testator at the time, the condition of his property, his relations to his family, etc., but never to prove his declarations prior to or after the execution of the instrument. Ransdell v. Boston (Ill.) 525

23. The meaning of a cipher telegram may be proved by the person who sent it. Carland v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Mich.) 280

Opinions.

24. An expert may testify directly from personal investigation as to his opinion on a matter of scientific investigation. Green v. Ashland Water Co. (Wis.) 117

25. The opinion of an attorney that the title of land is defective is not evidence, as that is a question of law for the court. Brackenridge v. Claridge (Tex.) 593

26. Testimony as to the price of wheat at a certain market, by one who testifies that he knew what it was, is sufficient to go to the jury. Carland v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Mich.) 280

Declarations.

27. Declarations of a conductor when leaving cars on a switch, that the railroad company has determined to furnish no more cars for the shipments that were being made, are evidence against the carrier in an action for failure to furnish cars. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Campbell (Tex.) 225

28. Declarations of the superintendent of a company when receiving ore, as to its being satisfactory, are competent evidence to show that it was satisfactory. Worthington v. Gwin (Ala.) 382

29. A statement by a telegraph agent to the sender of a message, that it has not been delivered, made as a report of his efforts to trace the telegram, is admissible, as against the telegraph company, to show the fact of nondelivery. Carland v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Mich.) 280

30. Statements by a man when stopped on his way from the room of a married woman at night are not admissible as part of the res gestæ upon the question of the woman's adultery. State v. Bradneck (Conn.) 620

31. Putting in evidence a portion of the cross-examination of a party in a prior case to show his admission will entitle him to have all his evidence read, so far as it bears upon or explains the admission. Weeks v. McNulty (Tenn.) 185

Relevancy.

32. The cause of the animosity between a railroad company and a person to whom shipments were being made is not material in an action by the shipper against the carrier for failure to furnish cars, although the existence of the animosity may be relevant. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Campbell (Tex.) 225

33. Evidence of a situation after the occurrence of an injury is inadmissible in an action for negligence unless preceded by prima facie proof that no change has taken place in the meantime. Green v. Ashland Water Co. (Wis.) 117

34. Evidence of precautions taken to prevent injuries of like character after the happening of one complained of is inadmissible in an action for negligence. Id.

35. Unproved allegations of knowledge and want of care on the part of an electric-light company will not prevent recovery for death of a fireman killed while in the discharge of his duty by stepping on a live grounded wire in a public alley, if sufficient is proved to establish the fact and manner of death, defendant's negligence, and due care on the part of deceased. Gannon v. Laclede Gas Light Co. (Mo.) 505

36. Evidence as to trouble which plaintiff had about the payment of fare on a railroad train is not admissible in an action to recover damages for alleged wrongful ejection from a street car. Springer v. Tacoma Traction Co. (Wash.) 706

37. Positive testimony by a street-car conductor that one suing for wrongful ejection from a car had not paid his fare cannot be bolstered up by asking him upon his examination in chief the reason which led him to that conclusion. Id.

38. Upon the question of liability for failure to promptly deliver a telegram directing the sendee to "come on first train" to arrest a fugitive from justice who had been entrapped by the sendee, evidence of the arrangement between sender and sendee with reference to the capture is admissible. McPeck v. Western U. Tele. Co. (Iowa) 214

39. An averment in answer to an action for rent that the lessor made false representations as to the fitness and condition of the building, is not such an allegation of fraud as will entitle defendant to show the condition of the building. York v. Steward (Mont.) 125

Weight; sufficiency.

40. Proof that placards were nailed up in cars and over platforms is not equivalent to proof that they were on a particular car on which a passenger was riding. Watkins v. Birmingham R. & E. Co. (Ala.) 297

41. A verdict cannot be directed for defendant in an action to recover damages for negligent injuries, although his evidence is uncontradicted and sufficient, if true, to overcome a prima facie cause made by plaintiff. Gannon v. Laclede Gas Light Co. (Mo.) 505

Ryan* (La.) 814

2. A woman cannot recover damages from a man from whom she contracted a venereal disease while living with him in marital relations under a marriage which was void because she had not been legally released from a former marriage, where she was not induced to enter into the void marriage by any fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation. Deeds v. Economic L. Asso. (Iowa) 537

4. The contract of a member of a mutual benefit association is purely unilateral, and he may refuse to continue his payments at any time, in which event the association can only declare his interest forfeited, and cannot sue for unpaid assessments. Lehman v. Clark (Ill.) 648

5. No equitable principle exists to compel a member of a mutual benefit association to pay assessments on the ground that he has had the benefit of the insurance, where the plan of the association is that all payments are in advance and entitle the member to protection until the next assessment is due. Id.

6. The forfeiture is self-executing, and requires no action on the part of the association under a by-law of a mutual benefit association providing that any member failing to pay assessments shall forfeit his membership and all benefits therefrom. Id.

7. An insurance policy containing no stipulation as to suicide, taken out in good faith by the assured, will not be avoided as against the beneficiary named therein by the fact that the assured thereafter while sane deliberately and purposely took his own life. Seiler v. Economic L. Asso. (Iowa) 537

8. An owner has an insurable interest to the extent of its value, in a building in process of construction at the time of a fire under a contract requiring the delivery of a completed building within a specified time, not yet expired, although the loss in the absence of insurance would fall on the contractor and not on the owner. Foley v. Manufacturers' & B. F. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 664

9. A policy of insurance on a steam fire engine, hose pipe, and hose cart, while located and contained in the fire engine house, "and not elsewhere," does not cover such property while being used in attempting to extinguish a fire several hundred feet from that building. L'Anse v. Fire Asso. of Phila. (Mich.) 838

10. Death resulting from a ruptured artery was not accidental, when it occurred while one was reaching over a chair to close window shutters, and he did not fall, slip, or lose his balance, and in fact nothing was done or occurred which he had not foreseen and planned, excepting the rupture of the artery. Feder v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. (Iowa) 693

11. A suit by a mutual benefit association will not lie to cover assessments where the contract provides only for forfeiture of interest in case of nonpayment. Lehman v. Clark (Ill.) 648

12. A receiver of a mutual benefit society cannot maintain a suit to recover assessments if the society itself could not do so. Id.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

1. The fact that "only members" are permitted in the rooms of a social club will not take the organization out of a statute prohibiting the keeping open of tippling houses on the Sabbath Day. Mohrmann v. State (Pa.) 398

2. One who is a manager and also a member and officer of a social club, and exercises a general superintendence over its affairs, including a bar from which intoxicating liquors are furnished, is amenable to a statute prohibiting tippling houses to be kept open on the Sabbath Day. Id.

3. The mere fact that the selling and drinking of intoxicating liquors was "only an incident, and not the main object," of the incorporation of a social club, will make the place where such liquors are dispensed and drunk none the less a tippling house, within the meaning of a statute making penal the keeping open of such houses on the Sabbath Day. Id.

4. The loss of money taken from the owner's pockets while he was intoxicated is not included in the damages occasioned by the sale of liquor to him, within the meaning of Sand. & H. (Ark.) Dig. § 4870, since the sale of the liquor is not the proximate cause of the loss, but this is due to the intervening wrongful act of a third person. Gage v. Harvey (Ark.) 143

2. In a suit for the compensation by persons who have performed labor on a building to which a mortgagee who has failed to comply with his contract to advance money to erect the building, and the obligors in a bond to release the building from mechanics' liens, are made parties, the decree should not go against the latter if it merely impresses the funds in the hands of the mortgagee with a trust in favor of the laborers, and does not purport to foreclose the liens. *Anglo-American Sav. & L. 2. 3. Rules adopted by railroad companies to govern the movement of trains cannot be regarded as unreasonable or insufficient in the absence of proof that they are so. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Barry (C. C. App. 8th C.) 349

4. A railroad company operating a single-track road is not negligent in failing to give those in charge of trains moving in the same direction telegraphic information of the relative position of the trains. Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (Conn.) 305

5. The legal duty of a railroad company operating a single-track road to its employees is not violated by failure to provide in its rules for giving those in charge of trains moving in the same direction telegraphic information of the relative position of the trains. Id.

6. An emergency requiring telegraphic communications to those in charge of trains moving in the same direction, of their relative position, is not shown by the fact that the rear train is an engine pushing a snow plow running faster than the forward train and throwing snow, which interferes with the lookout, while the forward train is behind schedule time and required to stop for cars at a siding where trains stop only occasionally and at irregular intervals. Id.

7. Telegraphic information is not, as matter of law, required to be given to those in charge of trains moving in the same direction on a single-track road as to the respective position of the trains, where the rules which have been generally adopted by railroads to govern such cases do not require it, but place the duty of looking out for the other train upon the train crews and the rules are not shown to be palpably unreasonable or insufficient. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Barry (C. C. App. 8th C.) 349

8. One taking service without objection or protest with a railroad whose rules to his knowledge require employees on trains out on the road to look out for other trains moving in the same direction assumes the risk incident to the operation of trains under such rules. Id.

9. The mere fact that rules of a railroad company for the regulation of the movement of trains on the road are sometimes violated by employees to the knowledge of conductors does not charge the company with liability for injury to an employee for failure to enforce its rules. Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (Conn.) 305

10. The rule exempting an employee from liability for injury to one servant through the negligence of a fellow servant is too firmly established to be reversed or seriously modified by any power vested in courts. Id.

11. The servants of a bailee for hire are not the servants of the bailor so as to make the latter responsible to a third party for their negligence. New Jersey Elec. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (N. J. Sup.) 849

1. A mortgage for money to be advanced for building purposes, when put on record before any contract for building, has priority over all liens for labor and materials subsequently supplied for the buildings. Anglo-American Sav. & L. Asso. v. Campbell (D. C. App.) 622

2. A mortgagee may continue to make advances to a mortgagor, when the loan is made expressly for building purposes, although he has notice of claims for labor and materials furnished for the buildings, and of the filing of liens therefor, if his contract does not require him to see to the application of the money advanced. Id.

3. The lien for the unpaid balance of the mortgage debt is not restored upon a redemption by the mortgagor under statutory authority by repaying the amount for which the property was sold at the trustee's sale, although such amount is less than the face of the mortgage. Fields v. Danehower (Ark.) 519

4. A tender by a mortgagor seeking to exercise his statutory right to redeem from the trustee's sale of the amount bid at such sale which is less than the face of the mortgage is ineffectual if coupled with a condition that the mortgagee release all claims upon the land although the payment would have cut off the mortgage lien, since that question is one which the mortgagee had a right to test in the courts. 1. The negligence of a carrier in taking a passenger past her station was not the proximate cause of an injury received by the passenger in consequence of the explosion of a lamp at a hotel at which she was waiting for a return train. Central of Ga. R. Co. v. Price (Ga.) 402

2. Failure of a railroad company to notify those in charge of two trains moving in the same direction of the relative position of the trains is not the proximate cause of a collision between them, where the crews in charge of them took no precautions to look out for and prevent a collision with the other train as required by the rules of the road. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Barry (C. App. 8th C.) 349

1. Assessments upon owners of abutting lots for new sidewalks and drains which were necessary only because of a change of the grade of the street are in violation of the South Carolina Constitution, which requires the whole property of the municipality to be taxed for any public or corporate purpose. Mauldin v. Greenville (S. C.) 101

2. The benefit to abutting property from the watering of a street in front of it may be such an improvement to the property that it can be made the subject of an assessment upon it. Sears v. Boston (Mass.) 834

3. Assessments for the sprinkling of streets within a certain territory may be lawfully made upon abutting property, although the sprinkling of other parts of the city is done at the public expense. Id.

4. The frontage rule of assessments for watering streets may be upheld when it does not appear that, as applied to the property assessed, it is not an approximately accurate method of determining benefits. Id.

5. Street sprinkling assessments made by a superintendent of streets by direction of the board of aldermen, and reported to them, may be regarded as made by the aldermen themselves, when they have made an appropriation based on the report. Id.

2. A railroad corporation, which, under its charter, constructs its tracks across an existing public highway or street of a city, does so on the implied condition that it will yield to the reasonable burdens imposed by the growth and development of the country or the city, and, where the public welfare demands a change of the grade of the highway or street, the railroad company must, at its own expense, make such alteration in the grade of its crossing as will conform to the new grade. *Cleveland v. 1. The fact that enforcement of a contract may require a multiplicity of orders by the court in its endeavor to superintend the business to which it relates does not deprive the court of jurisdiction, but justifies its refusal, in its sound discretion, to exercise it. Standard Fashion Co. v. Siegel-Cooper Co. (N. Y.) 854

a certain article in the store states a good cause of action, although owing to the difficulty attending the enforcement of the decree and the absence of public interest the court may refuse relief. Id.

See also TRADEMARK, 3.

1. The provision against private or local bills, found in N. Y. Const. art. 3, § 18, as amended in 1874 and continued in the revision of 1894, does not affect previously existing legislation. Ingersoll v. Nassau Elec. R. Co. (N. Y.) 236

2. A statute providing for special juries in each county having a population of 500,000 or more is a general, and not a local, act. People v. Dunn (N. Y.) 247

3. A statute for protecting labels of labor unions, which applies to every locality in the state and embraces every association or union of working men or women, is a general law, and in no sense local or private. Perkins v. Heert (N. Y.) 858

Title.

4. But one subject is indicated in the title of an act for the protection of skilled labor and the registration of labels, trademarks, names, brands, or devices covering the products of such labor associations or unions. Id.

5. The title of an act, which is, "A Further Supplement to an Act Entitled 'An Act to Protect Trademarks and Labels,'" sufficiently shows the object of the law, which is the protection of trademarks and labels, although the title of the prior act is not correctly recited. Schmalz v. Woolley (N. J. Err. & App.) 86

Construction.

6. A section of the Code, codified from a decision of the court, will be construed in the light of the source from which it came, unless its language imperatively demands a different construction. Calhoun v. Little (Ga.) 630

7. Failure of warehouse commissioners to appeal to the attorney general to institute suits or to question the legality of the conduct of warehousemen in storing their own grain in their warehouses does not amount to a practical construction of the statute providing for licensing warehouses so as to show that it authorizes such conduct. Central Elevator Co. v. People, Moloney (Ill.) 658

8. Mass. Stat. 1895, chap. 504, providing for indeterminate sentences, is to be construed prospectively and does not apply to sentences for offenses committed before it took effect. Murphy v. Com. (Mass.) 154

9. A heavy statutory penalty will not be awarded in a case which does not come strictly within the terms of the statute. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Campbell (Tex.) 225

10. A statute exempting college property from taxation in accordance with a well-settled and long-established public policy is to be construed reasonably so as to give full effect to the policy declared, as well as to avoid abuse and frustrate evasion, and is not within the rule of strict construction. Yale University v. New Haven (Conn.) 490

11. That a construction of a statute regulating railroad rates in such a manner as to deny power to make special rates to competitive points will injure an industry of the state will not require an opposite construction if the effect of the latter might be injurious to other industries and interests connected or identified with noncompetitive points. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 541

12. An argument drawn from hardship or inconvenience should have due weight with the court in determining the true construction of a statute which is doubtful or obscure, but never so much as to induce a construction that is absurd, defeats the evident object in view, or involves a stultification of those who made it. 1. The prospective condition of oil from a leased well cannot be properly taxed to the lessee, as personal property. Carter v. Tyler County Ct. (W. Va.) 725

2. Buildings used by a college exclusively as dormitories and dining halls for its students are exclusively occupied as a college, within the meaning of Conn. Gen. Stat. § 3820, providing for the exemption of such buildings from taxation. Yale University v. New Haven (Conn.) 490

3. Students' fees, whether apportioned to room rent or tuition, cannot be treated as income of real estate, and land occupied and reasonably necessary for the plant of a college is not productive real estate, within the meaning of a statute providing that a college shall not hold real estate exempt from taxation which shall afford more than a specified annual income. Id.

4. Real property substantially owned and enjoyed by a private person, although the title remains in a college, is not within the exemption of college property from taxation. Id.

5. A school building erected and maintained entirely by voluntary contributions, and the school in which is open to all free of charge, without regard to creed, color, race, or condition, is a purely public charity which may be exempt from taxation under Pa. Const. art. 9, § 1. White v. Smith (Pa.) 498

6. A convent building used solely as a residence for the teachers in a school maintained as a charity, and which is a part of the school property and is necessary for the efficient operation and management of the school, is included in the exemption of the school property from taxation as a purely public charity. Id.

7. The fact that the legal title to school property is in a bishop, with no declared trust in the grantee for a charitable use, so that the charity may be terminated at any time by a sale of the property, does not prevent the exemption of the property from taxation while used as a charity. Id.

8. The fact that all the trustees of property used for a school maintained as a charity are Catholics does not prevent the exemption of the property as a purely public charity, when there is no evidence to show the exclusion of any children because of their belief. Id.

9. An omission to state the estate of the owner, in a list of sales of lands for taxes, will not make the tax deed void. State v. Sponaule (W. Va.) 727

10. Payment of taxes for subsequent years by a purchaser at an invalid tax sale will not prevent forfeiture under W. Va. Const. art. 13, § 6, for failure of the real owner to enter the lands for taxation. Id.

1. The action by the sendee of a telegram for failure to promptly deliver it is based, not on breach of contract, but upon defendant's neglect of its duty as a public carrier of messages. McPeck v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Iowa) 214

2. A telegraph operator is acting within the scope of his authority in agreeing that a telegram shall be delivered out of office hours, so that his act will bind the company. Id.

3. A telegraph company which received a message under the agreement to deliver it about 9 o'clock P. M. cannot refuse to deliver it because that is out of office hours. Id.

4. Liability for neglect to deliver a telegram requiring the sendee's presence at another town that night cannot be defeated by showing that no train went until morning, 43 L. R. A.

where he had made arrangements to go with horses. Id.

5. The sender of a telephone message to the agent in charge of a telegraph office, with directions to send it by telegraph, does not make such agent his agent, although the telegraph company requires all messages to be given to the agent in writing, unless that fact is known to the sender. *Carland v. 1. The constitutional right of trial by jury is not violated by a statute providing that a jury in a criminal case shall be selected from a special list made from the general list by a jury commissioner. People v. Dunn (N. Y.) 247

2. The requirement of U. S. Const. Amend. 6, that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, is confined to prosecutions in the United States courts, and does not apply to those in the state courts. State v. Bates (Utah) 33

3. The offense charged in the indictment, the description of which includes murder in the first degree as well as in the second degree, but which expressly characterizes the crime as murder in the second degree, is within Utah Const. art. 1, § 10, providing that in courts of general jurisdiction, except in capital cases, a jury shall consist of eight jurors. Id.

Questions for jury.

4. Whether or not inducement of a person to break his contract with another is the proximate cause of the resulting injury to the latter is a question for the jury. Doremus v. Hennessy (Ill.) 797

5. The reasonableness of rules adopted by a railroad company for the movement of trains is a question of law for the court. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Barry (C. C. App. 8th C.) 349

6. The reasonableness of the conduct of a lady passenger who hurts her arm while attempting to escape in haste and fright from a car in which an oil lamp has blazed up, and oily waste with which a brakeman tries to smother the flame has caught fire, is a question for the jury. Gannon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (Mass.) 833

7. The meaning of the word "negligent" is a question of law where the law declares that the other conditions being present a person is liable for the injury caused by his conduct if it is negligent in the sense denoting the conception of moral blame or fault imputed to a person legally liable for the consequences of an unintentional act. Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (Conn.) 305

8. The questions of the negligence of a carrier and the contributory negligence of a passenger who is injured while riding on a car platform are for the jury. Graham v. McNeill (Wash.) 300

9. It is a question for the jury whether a man is guilty of negligence in stepping from a car, or preparing to do so, when it is going about three miles an hour. Watkins v. Birmingham R. & E. Co. (Ala.) 297

10. The question of negligence of the mate of a vessel in failing to resort to strong measures to obtain command of the ship because the captain has become mentally deranged is for the determination of the jury. Williams v. Hays (N. Y.) 253

11. Whether or not the failure to capture a fugitive from justice was due to neglect to deliver the telegram conveying information of his whereabouts is a question for the jury, where he had been enticed to a room and disarmed while a person having three assistants and a team engaged was waiting 12 miles away for notice to come and make the arrest. McPeck v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Iowa) 214

12. Whether or not sufficient diligence was exercised in attempting to deliver a telegram of the importance of which the company was notified is a question for the jury, where the messenger testifies that he went to the sendee's house at the proper time, and repeatedly rapped loudly on the door, but received no response, and members of the sendee's family testify that they were in the house at that time and heard no rapping, although they would have been likely to have heard it had there been any. Id.

Instructions.

13. Error in admitting a judgment as evidence in another suit is not relieved by the court's statement to the jury that the judgment is not conclusive but merits serious consideration. State v. Bradneck (Conn.) 620

14. A requested instruction to find for defendants if plaintiff quitted their services pursuant to an agreement for a strike should not be qualified or confused by adding a clause as to his reason for quitting and the effect upon him of danger or apparent danger. Fisher v. Walsh (Wis.) 810

People* (Ill.) 790

2. A prior appropriator of water from a natural stream flowing through state lands has such a vested right to the use of the water and to the ditch in which it flows, also constructed on said lands, as will defeat the claim of one who, with notice of such diversion and existence of the ditch, obtains from the state a deed of the premises, without reservation of any water rights. Carson v. Gentner (Or.) 130

3. Percolating water is regarded as a part of the earth itself, as much as the soil and the stones, with the same absolute right of use and appropriation by the owner of the land in which it is. Wheelock v. Jacobs (Vt.) 105

4. A stream of water large enough to fill a  $\frac{5}{8}$  pipe, running through a fissure or hole in the bed rock several feet below the surface of the ground, but not flowing in a well-defined channel underground, is to be deemed percolating water, which can be appropriated by the owner of the land without liability to the owner of a spring a short distance therefrom, into which some of the water has been accustomed to find its way. Id.

5. A grant of a spring does not by implication convey percolating water before it reaches the spring. Id.

Public water supply.

6. A waterworks company operating under a franchise from and contract with a municipal corporation in distributing water for public and domestic use is not responsible as an implied warrantor of the purity of the water distributed by it. Green v. Ashland Water Co. (Wis.) 117

7. A water company which knowingly supplies to its customers water so contaminated with impurities as to be dangerous for domestic use, under circumstances such that they are liable to use the water in ignorance of the danger, if it does not disclose the danger to them, is liable on the ground of negligence or fraud for any damages sustained by a customer without contributory fault on his part. Id.

8. Knowledge, or reasonable means of knowledge, of the dangerously impure condition of a water supply, will prevent a consumer who is injured by the impure water from recovering damages from the water company either because of its negligence or fraud in supplying impure water. Id.

1. The interest of the son during the life of his mother is at most a mere expectancy under a will bequeathing property to a trustee to hold for the benefit of the widow during her life and upon her death to vest absolutely in the son if he shall procure a divorce from his wife. Ransdell v. Boston (Ill.) 526

2. A condition attached to the vesting of an absolute estate under a devise or bequest to a son, that he shall procure a divorce from his present wife in default of which his interest shall be restricted to a life estate will not be deemed void as contrary to public policy where the divorce action between the son and his wife was pending when the will was executed. Id.

3. The condition attaching to the absolute vesting of the fee under a devise in trust to pay the income of real property to the testator's son until he shall procure a divorce from his wife and upon the happening of that event to convey the fee to him with a limitation over to "other devisees under the will in case he dies childless without having obtained a divorce,"—is a condition precedent and if broken prevents him from taking the fee even if it is invalid as contrary to public policy. Ransdell v. Boston (Ill.) 526 satisfaction with the methods of a party in mining ore may be asked on cross-examination if he did not afterwards propose to contract with him for mining. Worthington v. Gwin (Ala.) 382

3. One who pleads adultery of his wife to a criminal charge of nonsupport cannot be held to the answers given on cross-examination by a witness for the state to the effect that witness never had said that he had been criminally intimate with defendant's wife, but may introduce evidence to contradict him. State v. Bradneck (Conn.) 620

4. One who puts a witness on the stand, but excuses him without asking him any questions that are material to the issues on trial, is not thereby precluded, if the witness is afterwards called and examined by the opposite party, from cross-examining him and discrediting him by proving his contradictory statements out of court. Fall Brook Coal Co. v. Hewson (N. Y.) 676
